cated a generosity of soul which is scarcely to be paralleled.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 189.

5273. SOUL, Seat of the. Aristotle. He informs us that, in his opinion, the seat of the soul is that portion of the brain called the pineal gland, a small, solid mass of nervous matter in the midst of the lobes of the brain. The reason which this great philosopher gives for so thinking is, that "all the other parts of the brain are double, and thought is single." Man's soul thus being in the head, he feels it necessary to explain why we are provided with bodies and limbs. Since the soul is completely enclosed within the skull, why should we be encumbered with such a great mass of unspiritual matter? The gods foresaw, he tells us, that the head, being round, would roll down the hills, and could not ascend steep places; and to prevent this, the body was added as a carrier and locomotive of the head.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 560.

5274. SOUL, Superiority of the. William III. [William III. was for many years afflicted with the asthma, and during the later years of his life was greatly opposed and annoyed by the partisan spirit in Parliament, which ignored his great services to England, and his recommendations for the security of the State. In the summer of 1701 he appeared in the last stages of bodily feebleness, but the labors of the following autumn appeared to improve his health. It was a period of public exigency, arising from the aggressive attitude of France. William seemed to rise superior to bodily disease in preparing for the conflict which was threatened.] It has been admirably said by Lord Mahon: "Let those who doubt the dominion of the soul over the bodily powers, who deny that a strong mind can sway and strengthen and force onward a feeble suffering frame—let such observe whether in the last labors of William to form the Alliance, or in the Alliance itself when formed, they can discover any trace of sickness—one single mark of languor or decline."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 16, p. 253.

5275. SOVEREIGN, An American. General Grant. [After sixteen years of public service he proposed a tour of travel.] A government vessel, the Indiana, was placed at his disposal, without limit as to time. This announcement awakened the liveliest interest in England, where he was first to land, and it was agitated in all the papers whether the courtesies tendered him should be those accorded to a sovereign ruler or a private citizen. Van Buren and Fillmore had both been received simply as distinguished American citizens. At length Lord Beaconsfield announced that he should be received as a sovereign.—HEADLEY'S TRAVELS OF GENERAL GRANT, p. 5.

5276. SOVEREIGNTY, Claims of. Sword of Mars. It was natural enough that the Scythians should adore, with peculiar devotion, the god of war; but as they were incapable of forming either an abstract idea or a corporeal representation, they worshipped their tutelar deity under the symbol of an iron cimeter. One of the shepherds of the Huns perceived that a heifer who was grazing had wounded herself in the foot, and curiously followed the track of the blood, till he discovered, among the long grass, the point of an ancient sword, which he dug out of the ground and presented to Attila. That magnanimous, or, rather, that artful, prince accepted, with pious gratitude, this celestial favor; and, as the rightful possessor of the sword of Mars, asserted his divine and indefeasible claim to the dominion of the earth.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 34, p. 390.

5277. SPECIALTY, Success by. Emperor Maximian. Maximian was born a peasant, and, like Aurelian, in the territory of Sirmium. Ignorant of letters, careless of laws, the rusticity of his appearance and manners still betrayed in the most elevated fortune the meanness of his extraction. War was the only art which he professed. . . . After the example of Marcus, he gave himself a colleague in the person of Maximian, on whom he bestowed at first the title of Cæsar, and afterward that of Augustus.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 405.

5278. SPECTACLE, Magnificent. Cleopatra. [She left her dominions to visit Antony in Cilicia.] She sailed along the river Cydnus in a most magnificent galley. The stern was covered with gold, the sails were of purple, and the oars were silver. These, in their motion, kept time to the music of flutes and pipes and harps. The queen, in the dress and character of Venus, lay under a canopy embroidered with gold, of the most exquisite workmanship, while boys, like painted Cupids, stood fanning her on each side of the sofa. Her maids were of the most distinguished beauty, and, habited like the Nereids and the Graces, assisted in the steerage and conduct of the vessel. The fragrance of burning incense was diffused along the shores, which were covered with multitudes of people. Some followed the procession, and such numbers went down from the city to see it, that Antony was at last left alone on the tribunal. A rumor was soon spread that Venus was come to feast with Bacchus, for the benefit of Asia. Antony sent to invite her to supper; but she thought it his duty to wait upon her, and to show his politeness, on her arrival he complied. He was astonished at the magnificence of the preparations, but particularly at that multitude of lights, which were raised or let down together, and disposed in such a variety of square and circular figures, that they afforded one of the most pleasing spectacles that has been recorded in history.—PLUTARCH'S ANTONY.

5279. SPECULATION, Endangered by. "Black Friday." In the autumn of 1869 occurred the most extraordinary monetary excitement ever known in the United States, or perhaps in the world. A company of unscrupulous speculators in New York City, headed by Jay Gould and James Fisk, Jr., succeeded in producing what is known as a "corner" in the gold market, and brought the business interests of the metropolis to the verge of ruin. During the civil war the credit of the government had declined to such an extent that at one time a dollar in gold was worth two hundred and eighty-six cents in paper currency; but after the restoration of the national authority the value of paper money appreciated, and in the fall of 1869 the ratio of gold to the greenback dollar had fallen to about one hundred and thirty to one hundred. There were at this time, in the banks of New York, fifteen million dollars in gold coin and in the sub-treasury of the United States a hundred millions more. The plan of Gould and Fisk was to get control, by purchase, of the greater part of the fifteen millions, to prevent the secretary of the treasury from selling any part of the hundred millions under his authority; then, having control of the market, to advance the price of gold to a fabulous figure, sell out all which they held themselves, and retire from the field of slaughtered fortunes with their accumulated millions of spoils. . . . Having carefully arranged all the preliminaries, the conspirators, on the 18th of September, began their work of purchasing gold, at the same time constantly advancing the price. By the 22d of the month they had succeeded in putting up the rate to a hundred and forty. On the next day the price rose to a hundred and forty-four. The members of the conspiracy now boldly avowed their determination to advance the rate to two hundred, and it seemed that on the morrow they would put their threat into execution. On the morning of the 24th, known as Black Friday, the bidding in the Gold Room began with intense excitement. The brokers of Fisk and Gould advanced the price to a hundred and fifty, a hundred and fifty-five, and finally to a hundred and sixty, at which figure they were obliged to purchase several millions by a company of merchants who had banded themselves together with the determination to fight the gold-gamblers to the last. Just at this moment came a despatch that Secretary Boutwell had ordered a sale of four millions from the sub-treasury. There was an instantaneous panic. The price of gold went down twenty per cent in less than as many minutes! The speculators were blown away in an uproar; but they managed, by accumulated frauds and corruptions, to carry off with them more than eleven million dollars, as the fruit of their nefarious game. Several months elapsed before the business of the country recovered from the effects of the shock.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 68, p. 553.

5280. SPECULATION, Epidemic of. England, 1720. [Under the influence of the gigantic South Sea Scheme the spirit of speculation in 1720 became an epidemic.] Companies of every character—water companies, fishery companies, companies for various manufactures, companies for settlements and foreign trade—infinite varieties, down to companies for fattening hogs and importing jackasses from Spain—rushed into the market amid the universal cry for shares, and more shares. . . . It was calculated that the value of the stock of all the companies . . . was twice as much as the fee simple of all the land of the kingdom, . . . and five times as much as the circulating medium of Europe.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 3, p. 42.

5281. SPECULATION, Imperilled by. Rascality. The year 1819 was noted for a great financial crisis—the first of many that have occurred to disturb and distress the country. With the reorganization of the Bank of the United States, in 1817, the improved facilities for credit gave rise to many extravagant speculations, generally conceived in dishonesty and carried on by fraud. The great branch bank at Baltimore was especially infested by a band of unscrupulous speculators, who succeeded, in connivance with the officers, in withdrawing from the institution fully two millions of dollars beyond its securities. President Cheves, however, of the Superior Board of Directors, adopted a policy which exposed the prevailing rascality, and by putting an end to the system of unlimited credits, gradually restored the business of the country to a firmer basis. But for the time being financial affairs were thrown into confusion; and the Bank of the United States itself was barely saved from suspension and bankruptcy.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 52, p. 419.

5282. SPECULATION, Mania for. France. [John Law had the management of the finances of France.] Dukes and footmen, capitalists and shop-boys, ladies of the court and servant-maids, jostled one another in their eagerness to buy the favorite share of the moment. The provinces poured into Paris tens of thousands of people eager to join in the maddening game, and the mania spread at last to all the countries of Europe. Kings and princes of distant lands bought shares in Law's delusive schemes, and in London the mania raged almost as violently as at Paris. Money was borrowed in Paris at the rate of a quarter per cent per quarter of an hour, the lender keeping his eyes upon his watch. Desk-room was let in the vicinity of the share-market for fifty francs a day. Shares, bonds, and coin changed in value fifty times in a morning. So popular was the magician who had conjured up this state of things, that large sums were given for places where he could be seen in passing, and it was a distinction to be able to say, "I have seen John Law." A poor old cobbler, who had a little shop in the street thus suddenly invested with so much importance, cleared two hundred francs a day by letting chairs and desks, and selling pens and paper. Men made fortunes in a few days. People who were lackeys one week kept lackeys the next. Law's own coachman came to him one day and addressed him thus: "I am going to leave you, sir. Here are two young men, both of whom, I answer for it, are excellent coachmen. Take your choice, and I will keep the other myself." . . . This madness raged in Europe eight months, during which people thought the age of gold had come; for, while hundreds of thousands appeared to gain, very few seemed to lose. The constant rise in price of shares and royal paper appeared to enrich everybody, and ruin nobody. . . . The reaction, I need not say, was terrific. When first the suspicion arose that all these fine fortunes were founded upon paper of fictitious value, it spread with alarming rapidity. By various adroit manoeuvres Law checked the progress of distrust, but he could only check it. The rush to "realize" grew in volume and intensity from day to day, until it became a universal panic.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 455.

5283. — — —. England. The age of companies came very soon after the revolution. No scheme of fraud, no delusion of folly, was transparent enough to make its victims stay their headlong pursuit of imaginary wealth. The mania never stopped. Several years after the ruin produced by the infatuation of the South Sea Scheme, the management of companies was thus spoken of: "We are so fond of companies, it is a wonder that we have not our shoes blacked by one, and a set of directors made rich at the expense of our very blackguards." The fluctuations, soon after the revolution, in the price of shares, not only of "new projects and schemes promising mountains of gold," but of the established trading companies, were so excessive, that the business of the Royal Exchange in its stock-jobbing department might be compared to the operations of a great gambling house.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 3, p. 41.

5284. SPECULATION, Oppression by. France. [In 1772, during the reign of Louis XV.] the distress of the lower classes was grievously augmented by a scandalous association called the "Pacte de Famine," which produced artificially an immense rise in the price of corn. The king himself was a large shareholder in this company, which bought up the grain in France, exported it, and then re-introduced it at an enormous profit. The people were thus driven to the last extremity of misery; and yet no one ventured to raise his voice against this abominable traffic, the slightest complaint being followed by consignment to the dungeons of the Bastille.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 24, § 2.

5285. SPECULATION, Prevention of. By Legislation. When Congress convened [in September, 1873], a bill authorizing the issue of treasury notes, not to exceed ten millions of dollars, was passed as a temporary expedient. More important by far was the measure proposed by the President, and brought before Congress, under the name of "The Independent Treasury Bill." By the provisions of this remarkable project the public funds of the nation were to be kept on deposit in a treasury to be established for that special purpose. It was argued by Mr. Van Buren and his friends that the surplus money of the country would drift into the independent treasury and lodge there; and that by this means the speculative mania would be effectually checked, for extensive speculations could not be carried on without an abundant currency. It was in the nature of the President's plan to separate the business of the United States from the general business of the country. The Independent Treasury Bill was passed by the Senate, but defeated in the House of Representatives.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 56, p. 438.

5286. SPECULATION, Ruinous. Mississippi Scheme. A dividend of twelve per cent was soon declared upon the shares, and an incredible impulse was given to the sale, the anxiety to obtain them amounting to infatuation. In October they reached the preposterous price of 10,000 francs, twenty times their original value; it is even said that at last they were not to be purchased under eighteen or twenty thousand francs. Enormous fortunes were realized during the height of the ferment by speculators of all classes—from princes, generals, and prelates, down to petty shop-keepers, clerks, lackeys, waiting-maids, and courtesans. A fictitious and baseless prosperity overspread the whole kingdom. But a reaction was inevitable. Such was the rage for obtaining the bank-paper, that Law found himself unable to control its issue; its circulation was increased to the portentous amount of three thousand millions of francs, whereas the whole value of the metallic coinage existing in France did not exceed seven hundred millions. Toward the close of 1719 suspicion began to gain ground as to the solvency both of the bank and of the company, and many of the largest shareholders prudently converted their shares and notes into investments in money, jewels, and landed property. The Prince of Conti gave the signal for this assault upon the public credit by extorting from the bank three cart-loads of silver in exchange for his bank-notes. Every exertion was now made by the regent and Law to arrest the downward movement, but in vain. Money payments were forbidden for sums above 100 francs; the currency of the bank-notes was made obligatory, and at last all payments in specie were prohibited. Violent means were adopted to enforce these tyrannical decrees; but it was impossible to stem the tide of reaction; the public confidence was shaken more and more every day, and the hollowness of the whole system soon becoming manifest, a universal panic ensued.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 23, § 4.

5287. SPECULATORS, Defeat of. Napoleon I. The state of the empire was now such that the public funds began to decline, England, Spain, and Portugal, . . . Austria, . . . Prussia, . . . longing for an opportunity to retrieve . . . fallen fortunes. [Russia was doubtful.] Speculators in the public funds endeavored to excite a panic. The price fell from ninety-four as low as seventy. Napoleon immediately roused himself. . . . "I mean," said he, "to make a campaign against the bears." By means of judicious purchases, steadily executed for one or two months, the speculators for a fall were beaten. The public funds rose again to the price which Napoleon deemed it a point of honor for the government to maintain. . . . Many of the speculators . . . were ruined.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 2.

5288. SPECULATORS, Pernicious. Virginia. King Charles [I.] commissioned John Harvey to assume the government. He arrived in the autumn of 1629, and from this time until 1635 the colony was distracted with the presence of a most unpopular chief magistrate. He seems to have been disliked on general principles, but the greatest source of dissatisfaction was his partiality to certain speculators and land monopolists, who at this time infested Virginia, to the annoyance and injury of the poorer people. There were many old land grants, covering districts of territory, which were now occupied by actual settlers, and between the holders of the lands and the holders of the titles violent altercations arose. In these disputes the governor became a partisan of the speculators against the people, until the outraged assembly of 1635 passed a resolution that Sir John Harvey be thrust out of office, and Captain West be appointed in his place, "until the king's pleasure may be known in the matter." A majority of the councillors sided with the burgesses, and Harvey was obliged to go to England to stand his trial.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 12, p. 115.

5289. SPECULATORS, Revenge on. By the Poor [During the Revolution.] On the morning of the 22d of July [1789] some peasants of Vitry, near Fontainebleau, are leading into Paris an old man bound with ropes to the tail of a cart. On his neck is fastened a bundle of grass, and a collar of nettles is round his neck. It is Foulon, who has been denounced as a speculator in famine—one who said the poor should eat grass if they could not get bread. He was hanged to a lantern at the corner of a street. His head was cut off; a bundle of hay was stuffed into the mouth.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 9, p. 175.

5290. SPEECH, Brevity in. General Grant. [He was entertained by the city of Manchester, England, where he spoke longer than usual. He commonly used but a very few words in an address.] In reply to a toast of the mayor, he said with a smile that Englishmen had got more and longer speeches out of him than his own countrymen, but they were poorer, simply because they were longer than he was accustomed to make.—HEADLEY'S TRAVELS OF GRANT, p. 7.

5291. ———. General Grant. One of his soldier friends, who is said to be almost as reserved as himself, was commissioned to present the general with an elegantly engraved gold cup, in the name of the soldiers who had served under him. The warrior was introduced into the Grant household, bearing the cup. . . . He quietly placed the cup upon a sideboard, remarking, "That's the cup." The President looked at it in a dreamy sort of a way, and said, "Thank you." Then he offered his companion-in-arms a cigar. The two veterans sat down, and facing each other, smoked away in silence, while the deputation of soldiers outside waited in vain for the speech which is usual on such occasions.—TRAVELS OF GENERAL GRANT, p. 89.

5292. SPEECH, Dissembling. Chosroes. [The ruler of the Turks.] While the successor of Disabul celebrated his father's obsequies, he was saluted by the ambassadors of the Emperor Tiberius, who proposed an invasion of Persia, and sustained, with firmness, the angry and perhaps the just reproaches of that haughty barbarian. "You see my ten fingers," said the great khan, and he applied them to his mouth. "You Romans speak with as many tongues, but they are tongues of deceit and perjury. To me you hold one language, to my subjects another; and the nations are successively deluded by your perfidious eloquence."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42, p. 209.

5293. SPEECH, Earnest. John Milton. [Milton's plea for the commonwealth:] "What I have spoken is the language of that which is not called amiss the good old cause. . . . Thus much I should, perhaps, have said, though I were sure I should have spoken only to trees and stones, and had none to cry to but with the prophet, 'O earth, earth, earth!' to tell the very soil itself what her perverse inhabitants are deaf to. Nay, though what I have spoken should happen to be the very last words of our expiring liberty."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 14, p. 233.

5294. SPEECH, Irrepressible. Lady Fairfax. [When Charles I. was on his trial before the High Court of Justice, while the President was addressing the commissioners, and saying that the prisoner was brought before the court to answer a charge of high treason and other crimes, brought before him, in the name of the people of England, a voice was heard from the gallery: "It's a lie—not one half of them." It came from Lady Fairfax.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 7, p. 109.

5295. ———. Son of Cræsus. [Cyrus captured Sardis.] The only son Cræsus had living was dumb. This young prince, seeing a soldier, when the city was taken, ready to give the king, whom he did not know, a stroke upon the head with his cimeter, made such a violent effort and struggle, out of fear and tenderness for the life of his father, that he broke the string of his tongue, and cried out, "Soldier, spare the life of Cræsus!"—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1, art. 1.

5296. SPEECH, Passionate. Emperor Julian. He sometimes forgot the gravity of his station, asked indiscreet or unseasonable questions, and betrayed, by the loudness of his voice and the agitation of his body, the earnest vehemence with which he maintained his opinion against the judges, the advocates, and their clients. But his knowledge of his own temper prompted him to encourage, and even to solicit, the reproach of his friends and ministers; and whenever they ventured to oppose the irregular sallies of his passions, the spectators could observe the shame, as well as the gratitude, of their monarch.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 22, p. 407.

5297. SPEECH, Plainness of. Athenians. At the close of an audience which he gave to some Athenian ambassadors, who were come to complain of some act of hostility, he asked whether he could do them any service. "The greatest service thou couldst do us," said Demochares, "would be to hang thyself." Philip [of Macedonia], without the least emotion, though he perceived that all the persons present were highly offended, . . . answered, "Go tell your superiors that those who dared to make use of such insolent language are more haughty and less peaceably inclined than they who can forgive them."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 14, § 8.

5298. SPEECH, Responsibility in public. Pericles. Such was the solicitude of Pericles when he had to speak in public, that he always first addressed a prayer to the gods that not a word might unawares escape him unsuitable to the occasion.—PLUTARCH'S PERICLES.

5299. SPEECH, Toleration of free. Frederick the Great. He once saw a crowd staring at something on a wall. He rode up, and found that the object of curiosity was a scurrilous placard against himself. The placard had been posted up so high that it was not easy to read it. Frederick ordered his attendants to take it down and put it lower. "My people and I," he said, "have come to an agreement which satisfies us both. They are to say what they please, and I am to do what I please."—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 48.

5300. SPEECH, Unrestrainable. Reign of James II. [Seven bishops who refused to please the king by betraying the Protestant religion were brought to trial.] It seemed that at length this hard fight had been won. The case for the crown was closed. Had the counsel for the bishops remained silent, an acquittal was certain; for nothing which the most corrupt and shameless judge could venture to call legal evidence of publication had been given. The chief justice was beginning to charge the jury, and would undoubtedly have directed them to acquit the defendants; but Finch, too anxious to be perfectly discreet, interfered, and begged to be heard. "If you will be heard," said Wright, "you shall be heard; but you do not understand your own interests." The other counsel for the defence made Finch sit down, and begged the chief justice to proceed. He was about to do so when a messenger came to the solicitor-general with news that Lord Sunderland could prove the publication, and would come down to the court immediately. Wright maliciously told the counsel for the defence that they had only themselves to thank for the turn which things had taken. The countenances of the great multitude fell. Finch was, during some hours, the most unpopular man in the country. Why could he not sit still, as his betters, Sawyer, Pemberton, and Pollexfen had done? His love of meddling, his ambition to make a fine speech, had ruined everything.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 351.

5301. SPEECH, Worthly. Indian Chief Canonchet. Taken prisoner at last, near the Blackstone, a young man began to question him. "Child," replied he, "you do not understand war; I will answer your chief." His life was offered him if he would procure a treaty of peace; he refused the offer with disdain. . . . Condemned to death, he only answered, "I like it well; I shall die before I speak anything unworthy of myself."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 12.

5302. SPELLING, Bad. George Washington. Washington himself, before he became a public man, was a bad speller. People were not so particular then in such matters as they are now; and besides, there really was no settled system of spelling a hundred years ago. When the general wrote for a "rheam of paper," a beaver "hatt," a suit of "cloaths," and a pair of "sattin" shoes, there was no Webster unabridged to keep people's spelling within bounds.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 9.

5303. SPELLING, Diverse. Shakespeare. In the first place, how did he spell his name? When he wrote it, he spelled it in various ways; but when he had it printed he spelled it Shakspeare, or Shakespeare, and so did his intimate friend, Ben Jonson. In his own day, the name was spelled in thirty-three different ways: Shaxpur, Schakespeyr, Chacksper, Shakaspeare, Schakespeire, etc.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 23.

5304. SPIES, Ensnared by. Reign of Theodosius. The general who commanded the military and naval powers of the Thracian frontier soon perceived . . . that the Barbarians, awed by the presence of his fleet and legions, would probably defer the passage of the river till the approaching winter. The dexterity of the spies, whom he sent into the Gothic camp [of Alatheus], allured the Barbarians into a fatal snare. They were persuaded that, by a bold attempt, they might surprise, in the silence and darkness of the night, the sleeping army of the Romans; and the whole multitude was hastily embarked in a fleet of three thousand canoes. The bravest of the Ostrogoths led the van; the main body consisted of the remainder of their subjects and soldiers; and the women and children securely followed in the rear. One of the nights without a moon had been selected for the execution of their design; and they had almost reached the southern bank of the Danube, in the firm confidence that they should find an easy landing and an unguarded camp. But the progress of the Barbarians was suddenly stopped by an unexpected obstacle: a triple line of vessels, strongly connected with each other, and which formed an impenetrable chain of two miles and a half along the river. While they struggled to force their way in the unequal conflict, their right flank was overwhelmed by the irresistible attack of a fleet of galleys, which were urged down the stream by the united impulse of oars and of the tide.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26, p. 67.

5305. SPIES, Shameless. Reign of James II. John Locke hated tyranny and persecution as a philosopher; but his intellect and his temper preserved him from the violence of a partisan. . . . In one point, however, he was vulnerable. He was a student of Christ Church in the University of Oxford. It was determined to drive from that celebrated college the greatest man of whom it could ever boast; but this was not easy. Locke had, at Oxford, abstained from expressing any opinion on the politics of the day. Spies had been set about him. Doctors of divinity and masters of arts had not been ashamed to perform the vilest of all offices, that of watching the lips of a companion in order to report his words to his ruin. The conversation in the hall had been purposely turned to irritating topics, to the Exclusion bill, and to the character of the Earl of Shaftesbury, but in vain. Locke never broke out, never dissembled, but maintained such steady silence and composure as forced the tools of power to own with vexation that never man was so complete a master of his tongue and of his passions. When it was found that treachery could do nothing, arbitrary power was used. After vainly trying to inveigle Locke into a fault, the government resolved to punish him without one. Orders came from Whitehall that he should be ejected, and those orders the dean and canons made haste to obey. Locke was travelling on the Continent for his health when he learned that he had been deprived of his home and of his bread without a trial or even a notice.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 505.

5306. SPIRIT, An impelling. George Fox the Quaker. A.D. 1649. Like Milton and Roger Williams, his soul abhorred the hiring ministry of diviners for money; and on the morning of a first-day he was moved to go to the great steeple-house and cry against the idol. "When I came there," says Fox, "the people looked like fallow ground, and the priest, like a great lump of earth, stood in the pulpit above. He took for his text these words of Peter, 'We have also a more sure word of prophecy,' and told the people this was the Scriptures. Now, the Lord's power was so mighty on me, and so strong in me, that I could not hold, but was made to cry out, 'Oh, no, it is not the Scriptures, it is the Spirit.'" . . . If cruelly beaten, or set in the stocks, or ridiculed as mad, he still obeyed the oracles of the voice within him.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

5307. SPIRIT, Teachings of. Quaker Doctrine. The revelation of truth is immediate. It springs neither from tradition nor from the senses, but directly from the mind. No man comes to the knowledge of God but by the Spirit. "Each person," says Penn, "knows God from an infallible demonstration in himself, and not on the slender grounds of men's lo here interpretations, or lo there. The instinct of Deity is so natural to man, that he can no more be without it, and be, than he can be without the most essential part of himself."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

5308. SPIRITS, Communication with. Swedenborg. In one of his letters, he says: "I have been called to a holy office by the Lord Himself, who most graciously manifested Himself to me, His servant, in the year 1743, when He opened my sight to a view of the spiritual world, and granted me the privilege of conversing with spirits and angels, which I enjoy to this day. From that time I began to print and publish various arcanæ that have been seen by me, or revealed to me, as respecting heaven and hell, the state of man after death, the true worship of God, the spiritual sense of the Word, with many other most important matters conducive to salvation and true wisdom."—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 8, p. 62.

5309. ——. Swedenborg. The Queen of Sweden asked him whether his spiritual intercourse was a science or art that could be communicated to others. He said: "No, it is the gift of the Lord." "Can you, then," said she, "speak with every one deceased, or only with certain persons?" He answered, "I cannot converse with all, but only with such as I have known in this world, with all royal and princely persons, with all renowned heroes, or great and learned men, whom I have known, either personally, or from their actions or writings; consequently, with all of whom I could form an idea; for it may be supposed that a person whom I never knew, and of whom I could form no idea, I neither could nor would wish to speak with."—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 11, p. 90.

5310. SPIRITS, Intercourse with. New Platonists. [Of the Alexandrian schools.] Consuming their reason in these deep but unsubstantial meditations, their minds were exposed to illusions of fancy. They flattered themselves that they possessed the secret of disengaging the soul from its corporeal prison; claimed a familiar intercourse with demons and spirits; and, by a very singular revolution, converted the study of philosophy into that of magic. The ancient sages had derided the popular superstition.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 449.

5311. SPIRITS, Lying. Swedenborg. In his diary, written about this time, he says that "spirits narrate things wholly false, and lie. When spirits begin to speak with man, care should be taken not to believe them; for almost everything they say is made up by them, and they lie; so that if it were permitted them to relate what heaven is, and how things are in heaven, they would tell so many falsehoods, and with such strong assertion, that man would be astonished."—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 8, p. 69.

5312. SPIRITS, Ministering. Samuel Johnson. The following very solemn and affecting prayer was found after Dr. Johnson's decease:

... "April 26, 1752, being after 12 at night of the 25th. O Lord! Governor of heaven and earth, in whose hands are embodied and departed spirits, if thou hast ordained the souls of the dead to minister to the living, and appointed my departed wife to have care of me, grant that I may enjoy the good effects of her attention and ministrations, whether exercised by appearance, impulses, dreams, or in any other manner agreeable to thy government. Forgive my presumption, enlighten my ignorance, and however meaner agents are employed, grant me the blessed influences of thy holy Spirit, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 61.

5313. SPLENDOR, Palatial. Timour. [On his return from five years of conquest, Timour] erected a palace of marble, transparent like alabaster, which intercepted the cold and let through a softened light to the apartments. Greek painters brought from Byzantium painted its domes in fresco, presenting colored pages of the history of his campaigns. He was seen there in all his diversities of fortune, from the condition of a Tartar shepherd to that of sovereign of double Asia. He gave this palace to one of the daughters of his deceased son, Miran-Schah, named Beghizi.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 315.

5314. SPOILS, Abundant. Romans. In the course of a few years the riches of Syracuse, of Carthage, of Macedonia, and of Asia were brought in triumph to Rome. The treasures of Perseus alone amounted to near two millions sterling, and the Roman people, the sovereign of so many nations, was forever delivered from the weight of taxes. The increasing revenue of the provinces was found sufficient to defray the ordinary establishment of war and government, and the superfluous mass of gold and silver was deposited in the temple of Saturn, and reserved for any unforeseen emergency of the State.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 186.

5315. SPOILS, Abundant. Pillage of Constantinople. [By Crusaders.] Yet the magnitude of the prize surpassed the largest scale of experience or expectation. After the whole had been equally divided between the French and Venetians, fifty thousand marks were deducted to satisfy the debts of the former and the demands of the latter. The residue of the French amounted to four hundred thousand marks of silver, about eight hundred thousand pounds sterling; nor can I better appreciate the value of that sum in the public and private transactions of the age, than by defining it as seven times the annual revenue of the kingdom of England.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 60, p. 90.

5316. SPOILS, Dedication of. Pious. [When Aurelian the emperor returned from his conquests in the East], a considerable portion of his oriental spoils was consecrated to the gods of Rome; the Capitol and every other temple glittered with the offerings of his ostentatious piety; and the temple of the Sun alone received above fifteen thousand pounds of gold.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 11.

5317. SPOILS, Division of. Arabs. The Arab continued to unite the professions of a merchant and a robber; and his petty excursions for the defence or the attack of a caravan insensibly prepared his troops for the conquest of Arabia. The distribution of the spoil was regulated by a divine law; the whole was faithfully collected in one common mass; a fifth of the gold and silver, the prisoners and cattle, the movables and immovables, was reserved by the prophet for pious and charitable uses; the remainder was shared in adequate portions by the soldiers who had obtained the victory or guarded the camp; the rewards of the slain devolved to their widows and orphans.—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 38.

5318. SPORT, Magnificent. Oriental. [Bajazet, the Ottoman conqueror, invited some of his distinguished guests to a hunt in the valleys of Mount Olympus.] This chase, which attests to what prodigious magnificence the family of Othman had arisen in so few years, was conducted by seven thousand falcon-carriers on horseback, and by seven thousand gamekeepers of the imperial forests of Olympus. The dogs were clad in housings of purple, and wore collars ornamented with precious stones.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 299.

5319. SPORT, Thoughtless. Marriage. In 1393, on the occasion of the marriage of one of the ladies of the queen's household, a grand masked ball was given at court, in which Charles VI., with five of his nobles, disguised themselves as savages, in close-fitting dresses covered with pitch and tow to resemble hair. The young Duke of Orleans, excited, no doubt, by wine, approached these grotesque figures with a lighted torch, and, either accidentally or from wanton love of mischief, set their combustible costume in a blaze. The king was fortunately standing apart, and the Duchess of Berry hurried him out of the hall. Four of the unlucky maskers were burnt to death; one saved his life by throwing himself into a large tub of water which happened to be at hand.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 11, § 6.

5320. SPORT, Unenjoyed. Martin Luther. [While secluded at Wartburg Castle.] On one occasion he joined a hunting party, but took no pleasure in the sport. "I have been on a hunt," he writes to Spalatin, "for the past two days, and have tasted of that bitter-sweet enjoyment of our noble lords! We got two rabbits and a couple of poor partridges. A worthy occupation, in truth, for idle people! I continued my theological studies amid the snares and the dogs; and as much pleasure as I derived from viewing such sport, the more sympathy and sorrow I had in thinking of the mysterious truth the picture concealed. For the picture teaches nothing else than that the devil, through his godless masters and dogs—the bishops and theologians—secretly hunts and catches the innocent little animals—the common people. It is the picture of simple and believing souls which is thus vividly presented to my sorrowing heart. And once it happened that a poor little rabbit took refuge in the sleeve of my coat lying by the way. The dogs in their pursuit scented its hiding-place, first wounded, and then killed it. Thus the pope and Satan rage in their efforts to ruin saved souls, without concerning themselves about my labors."—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 10, p. 95.

5321. SPY, An infamous. Tempter. [In 1817 James Willan, a printer of Dewsbury, proved that a government spy named Oliver,] who represented himself as a delegate from the radicals of London, had for several times, for the space of two months, endeavored to seduce him into acts of violence and situations of danger, and that he had especially urged him to attend a meeting of "delegates," at which meeting ten men were arrested by a party of military. [The spy became a tempter.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 5, p. 81.

5322. STARVATION, Depopulated by. Italy. The twenty years of the Gothic war consumed the distress and depopulation of Italy. As early as the fourth campaign, under the discipline of Belisarius himself, fifty thousand laborers died of hunger in the narrow region of Picenum; and a strict interpretation of the evidence of Procopius would swell the loss of Italy above the total sum of her present inhabitants.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 4.

5323. STATE, Bereavement of the. Epaminondas. The Theban power expired with this great man, whom Cicero seems to rank above all the illustrious men Greece ever produced. Justin is of the same opinion, when he says, that as a dart is no longer in a condition to wound when the point of it is blunted, so Thebes, after having lost its general, was no longer formidable to its enemies, and its power seemed to have lost its edge and to be annihilated by the death of Epaminondas. Before him that city was not distinguished by any memorable action; and after him it sunk into its original obscurity; so that it saw its glory take birth and expire with this great man.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 12, ch. 1, § 27.

5324. STATE endangered. Criminals. Francis of La Roque, Lord of Roberval, in Picardy, was the next to undertake the colonization of the countries discovered by the French. This nobleman . . . was commissioned by the court of France to plant a colony on the St. Lawrence. . . . The man, however, who was chiefly relied on to give character and direction to the proposed colony was no other than James Cartier. He only seemed competent to conduct the enterprise with any promise of success. . . . The French peasants and mechanics were not eager to embark for a country which had nothing better than savages and snow. . . . So the work of enlisting volunteers went on slowly, until the government adopted the plan of opening the prisons of the kingdom and giving freedom to whoever would join the expedition. There was a rush of robbers, swindlers, and murderers, and the lists were immediately filled. Only counterfeiters and traitors were denied the privilege of gaining their liberty in the New World.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 5, p. 72.

5325. STATE, An honored. Virginia. Virginia is proud of being called the mother of presidents, and she has a right to the name. Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Harrison were all her sons. But she has many other illustrious children whose names would have received no additional lustre from the presidential office. This is particularly true of General Sam Houston, the father and president of the republic of Texas. He was born on the 2d of March, 1793, in Rockbridge County, Virginia.—LESTER'S SAM HOUSTON, p. 1.

5326. STATE neglected. Cicero said: "Even if I had no enemies, if I was supported as universally as I ought to be, still a medicine which will cure the diseased parts of the State is better than the surgery which would amputate them. The knights have fallen off from the Senate. The noble lords think they are in heaven when they have barbel in their pounds that will eat out of their hands, and they leave the rest to fate."—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12.

5327. STATE, Protection of the. By Education. [Charondas, the Grecian lawgiver,] required all children of the citizens to be educated in polite literature, the effect of which is to soften and civilize the minds of men, inspiring them with gentleness of manners, and inclining them to virtue; all which constitute the felicity of a State, and are equally necessary to citizens of all conditions. In this view he appointed salaries (paid by the State) for masters and preceptors, in order that learning, by being communicated gratuitously, might be acquired by all. He considered ignorance as the greatest of evils, and the source whence all vices flowed.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 7, ch. 2, § 2.

5328. STATE, Security of the. Napoleon I. [He witnessed the attack of the mob on the palace of the Tuileries.] Napoleon openly avowed his conviction that France, without education and without religion, was not prepared for the Republicanism of the United States. In this sentiment Lafayette and most of the wisest men of the French nation concurred. . . . In France at this time there was neither intelligence, religion, nor morality among the masses. There was no reverence for law, neither human nor divine.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 2.

5329. STATE, Rights of the. Nullification. The reopening of the tariff question occasioned great excitement in Congress and throughout the country. In the session of 1831-32 additional duties were levied upon manufactured goods imported from abroad. By this act the manufacturing districts were again favored at the expense of the agricultural States. South Carolina was specially offended. A great convention of her people was held, and it was resolved that the tariff law of Congress was unconstitutional, and therefore null and void. Open resistance was threatened in case the officers of the government should attempt to collect the revenues in the harbor of Charleston. In the United States Senate the right of a State, under certain circumstances, to nullify an act of Congress, was boldly proclaimed. On that issue occurred the famous debate between the eloquent Colonel Hayne, Senator from South Carolina, and Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, perhaps the greatest master of American oratory. The former appeared as the champion of State Rights, and the latter as the advocate of Constitutional Supremacy. But the question was not decided by debate. The President took the matter in hand, and issued a proclamation denying the right of any State to nullify the laws of Congress. But Mr. Calhoun, the Vice-President, resigned his office to accept a seat in the Senate, where he might better defend the doctrines of his State. The President having warned the people of South Carolina against pursuing the doctrines further, Mr. Clay brought forward and secured the passage of a [compromise] bill providing for a gradual reduction of the duties complained of, until, at the end of ten years, they should reach the standard demanded by the South.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 54, p. 428.

5330. STATES, Rights of. Taxation. July, 1776. The Confederacy [of the United States] now stood in the place of the crown as the central authority. . . . It was laid down as a fundamental article that "the United States assembled shall never impose or levy any tax or duties," except for postage; and this restriction—such was the force of habit—was accepted without remark.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 1.

5331. STATESMAN, Dangerous. Charles Townsend. A.D. 1767. He died at the age of forty-one, famed alike for incomparable talents and extreme instability. [He was called the weather-cock.] . . . If his indiscretion forbade esteem, his good-humor dissipated hate. He had been courted by all parties, but never possessed the confidence of any. He followed no guide, and he had no plan of his own. No one wished him as an adversary; no one trusted him as an associate. He sometimes spoke with boldness; but at heart he was as timid as he was versatile. . . . With power, fortune, affection, and honors clustering around him, he fell in the bloom of manhood, the most celebrated statesman who has left nothing but errors to account for his fame.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 30.

5332. STATESMAN, Degeneracy of. English. Cowper believed that the public men of his time had grown degenerate—"the age of virtuous politics is past."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 7, p. 114.

5333. STATESMANSHIP, Contemptible. Napoleon III. During the civil war the Emperor Napoleon III. interfered in the affairs of Mexico, and succeeded, by overawing the people with a French army, in setting up an empire. In the early part of 1864 the crown of Mexico was conferred on Maximilian, the Archduke of Austria, who established his government and sustained it with French and Austrian soldiers. But the Mexican President Juarez headed a revolution against the usurping emperor; the government of the United States rebuked France for having violated the Monroe Doctrine; Napoleon, becoming alarmed, withdrew his army, and Maximilian was overthrown. On the 13th of June, 1867, he was tried by court-martial and condemned to be shot, and six days afterward the sentence was carried into execution. The scheme of Napoleon, who had hoped to profit by the civil war and gain a foothold in the New World, was thus justly brought to shameful contempt.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 67, p. 545.

5334. STATESMANSHIP, Foolish. James II. He brought over Irishmen, not, indeed, enough to hold down the single city of London or the single county of York, but more than enough to excite the alarm and rage of the whole kingdom, from Northumberland to Cornwall. Battalion after battalion, raised and trained by Tyrconnel, landed on the western coast, and moved toward the capital; and Irish recruits were imported in considerable numbers to fill up vacancies in the English regiments. Of the many errors which

James committed, none was more fatal than this. Already he had alienated the hearts of his people by violating their laws, confiscating their estates, and persecuting their religion. Of those who had once been most zealous for monarchy, he had already made many rebels in heart; yet he might still, with some chance of success, have appealed to the patriotic spirit of his subjects against an invader, for they were a race insular in temper as well as in geographical position. Their national antipathies were, indeed, in that age unreasonably and unamiably strong. They had never been accustomed to the control or interference of any stranger. The appearance of a foreign army on their soil might impel them even to rally round a king whom they had no reason to love. William might perhaps have been able to overcome this difficulty; but James removed it. Not even the arrival of a brigade of Louis' musketeers would have exacted such resentment and shame as our ancestors felt when they saw armed columns of Papists, just arrived from Dublin, moving in military pomp along the high roads.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 393.

5335. STATESMANSHIP, National. William the Conqueror. Preparatory to William's plan of reducing England entirely under the feudal government, he found it necessary to engage in and complete a very great undertaking. This was a general survey of all the kingdom, an account of its extent, its proprietors, their tenures, and their values; the quantity of meadow, pasture, wood, and arable land which they contained; the number of tenants, cottagers, and servants of all denominations who lived upon them. Commissioners were appointed for this purpose, who, after six years employed in the survey, brought him an exact account of the whole property in the kingdom. This monument, called Doomsday Book, the most valuable piece of antiquity possessed by any nation, is at this day in existence, and is preserved in the English Exchequer. It was, in the year 1782, printed by an order of Parliament.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 8, p. 134.

5336. STATESMANSHIP, Ruinous. Spaniards. From Ferdinand the Catholic to Philip III., Spain had expelled three millions of Jews and Moors; her inferior nobility emigrated to America; in 1702 her census enumerated less than seven million souls. The nation that once would have invaded England had no navy; and, having the mines of Mexico and South America, it needed subscriptions for its defence. Foreigners, by means of loans and mortgages, gained more than seven eighths of the wealth from America, and furnished more than nine tenths of the merchandise shipped for the colonies. Spanish commerce had expired; Spanish manufactures had declined; even agriculture had fallen a victim to mortuaries and privilege. Inactivity was followed by poverty, and the dynasty itself became extinct.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

5337. STATUE, Honored by. Cato. The Athenians decreed above three hundred statues to Demetrius Phalereus. Honors thus prodigally lavished are no proofs of real merit, but the effects of servile adulation; and Demetrius Phalereus was culpable to a considerable degree in not opposing them to the utmost of his power, if he really was in a condition to prevent their taking place. The conduct of Cato was much more prudent, in declining several marks of distinction which the people were desirous of granting him; and when he was asked one day why no statues had been erected to him, when Rome was crowded with so many others, "I had much rather," said he, "people should inquire why I have none than why I have any."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 16, § 7.

5338. STATUE, Immense. Apollo. A gigantic statue of Apollo, or the sun, seventy cubits in height, was erected at the entrance of the harbor, a monument of the freedom and the arts of Greece. After standing fifty-six years, the colossus of Rhodes was overthrown by an earthquake; but the massy trunk and huge fragments lay scattered eight centuries on the ground, and are often described as one of the wonders of the ancient world. They were collected by the diligence of the Saracens, and sold to a Jewish merchant of Edessa, who is said to have laden nine hundred camels with the weight of the brass metal; an enormous weight, though we should include the hundred colossal figures and the three thousand statues which adorned the prosperity of the city of the sun.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 219.

5339. STATUE, Lofty. Abraham Lincoln. Mr. Lincoln, as he shook hands with the judge [Kelley, of Pennsylvania], inquired, "What is your height?" "Six feet three. What is yours, Mr. Lincoln?" "Six feet four." "Then," said the judge, "Pennsylvania bows to Illinois. My dear man, for years my heart has been aching for a President that I could look up to, and I've found him at last in the land where we thought there were none but little giants." [The distinguished Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, was known as the "little giant."]—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 3, p. 105.

5340. STEAMBOATS, First. In England. Henry Bell had his steam-passage boat running on the Clyde in 1811. In a few years steamboats were plying on the Thames.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 7, p. 131.

5341. STOICISM, admired. Southey. Epicurus showed how life could be simplified, indeed, by bringing it into obedience to a perfect law. Instead of a quietism haunted by feverish dreams—duty, action, co-operation with God. "Twelve years ago," wrote Southey in 1806, "I carried Epicurus in my pocket till my very heart was ingrained with it, as a pig's bones become redder by feeding him upon madder. And the longer I live, and the more I learn, the more am I convinced that stoicism, properly understood, is the best and noblest of systems." Much that Southey gained from stoicism he kept throughout his whole life, tempered, indeed, by the influences of a Christian faith, but not lost.—DOWDEN'S SOUTHEY, ch. 2.

5342. STONE, A sacred. Roman Emperor Bessianus Antoninus. The sun was worshipped at Emesa under the name of Elagabalus [from two Syriac words, Ela, a god, and Gabal, to form, the forming or plastic god], and under the form of a black conical stone, which, as it was universally believed, had fallen from heaven on that sacred place. To this protecting deity Antoninus, not without some reason, ascribed his elevation to the throne. The display of superstitious gratitude was the only serious business of his reign. The triumph of the god of Emesa over all the religions of the earth was the great object of his zeal and vanity; and the appellation of Elagabalus (for he presumed as pontiff and favorite to adopt that sacred name).—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 5, p. 170.

5343. ——. At Mecca. A small square edifice, or temple, called the Caabba, was held throughout all Arabia to be a place of the most supreme sanctity. Within this temple was a stone, which was the peculiar object of veneration, and was said to have descended from heaven, in those days of innocence when man was free from guilt as he came from the hands of his Creator. The stone was then white, but gradually became sullied, as man became more wicked, till at last it grew entirely black. From the pilgrimages which it was customary to make to this temple, and the riches it brought thither, Mecca became the most considerable city of Arabia.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 1, p. 50.

5344. STORM, A destructive. England. On the night of the 27th of November [1703] a mighty wind arose in the western and southern districts of England and in part of the eastern, which toppled down steeples, unroofed houses, drove great ships from their anchorage, and swept away the watchtowers of the coasts. The shores of the channel were strewn with wrecks. The Thames and the Severn were crowded with dismantled merchantmen, and hulls whose crews had been swept into the raging sea. Fourteen or fifteen men-of-war were cast away, and fifteen hundred seamen perished with them.—KNIIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 17, p. 269.

5345. STORM, Terrible. Reign of Charles I. Clamor and debate went on within the house [opposing the king's effort to rule by prerogative], and men's hearts failed them for fear without. While the Remonstrance was passing, a wild storm broke over London. Wind and hail, rain, lightning, and thunder, the like of it was never known in the memory of living man; the churchyard walls were broken down, the earth rent and torn from the graves, revealing, so it is said, the faces of the dead; supernatural shapes in the mist hung brooding over the Thames, and the superstitious saw misty shape and storm and tempest bearing on and beating against the house of the Duke of Buckingham, its stairs, and its walls. Storms were moving toward York House too.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 3, p. 68.

5346. STORM, Unequalled. Robert Burns. In February of the ensuing year, 1795, his duties as supervisor led him to what he describes as the "unfortunate, wicked little village" of Ecclefechan, in Annandale. The night after he arrived there fell the heaviest snow-storm known in Scotland within living memory. When people awoke next morning they found the snow up to the windows of the second story of their houses. In the hollow of Campsie hills it lay to the depth of from eighty to a hundred feet, and it had not disappeared from the streets of Edinburgh on the king's birthday, the 4th of June. Storm-stayed at Ecclefechan, Burns indulged in deep potations and in song-writing.—SHAIRP'S BURNS, ch. 7.

5347. STRANGERS, Chilled by. At St. Kilda. Macaulay's "History of St. Kilda" was very well written, except some foppery about liberty and slavery. I mentioned to him that Macaulay told me he was advised to leave out of his book the wonderful story, that, upon the approach of a stranger, all the inhabitants catch cold, but that it had been so well authenticated, he determined to retain it. JOHNSON: "Sir, to leave things out of a book, merely because people tell you they will not be believed, is meanness."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 185.

5348. STRATAGEM, Credible. Darius, King of Persia. At length, after a siege of twenty months, Darius won the city by a treacherous stratagem. One of his captains, mutilating his visage with hideous wounds, fled, as if for safety, to the Babylonians, and offered his services to avenge himself against Darius, who had used him thus inhumanly. The man was trusted by the credulous Babylonians with a high command, of which he availed himself to open the gates to the Persians. With aggravated meanness and cruelty Darius impaled alive three thousand of the principal citizens.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11, p. 116.

5349. STRATAGEM, Dishonorable. King of Spain. Seeing that King John [II.] still manifested an inclination for the enterprise, it was suggested to him by the Bishop of Ceuta that Columbus might be kept in suspense while a vessel secretly despatched in the direction he should point out might ascertain whether there were any foundation for his theory. By this means all its advantages might be secured, without committing the dignity of the crown by formal negotiations about what might prove a mere chimera. King John, in an evil hour, had the weakness to permit a stratagem so inconsistent with his usual justice and magnanimity. Columbus was required to furnish, for the consideration of the council, a detailed plan of his proposed voyage, with the charts and documents according to which he intended to shape his course. These being procured, a caravel was despatched with the ostensible design of carrying provisions to the Cape de Verde Islands, but with private instructions to pursue the designated route. Departing from those islands, the caravel stood westward for several days, until the weather became stormy; when the pilots, seeing nothing but an immeasurable waste of wild, tumbling waves still extending before them, lost all courage and put back, ridiculing the project of Columbus as extravagant and irrational. This unworthy attempt to defraud him of his enterprise roused the indignation of Columbus, and he declined all offers of King John to renew the negotiation.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, ch. 6.

5350. STRATAGEM, Success by. Georgia. [In June of 1742 the Spaniards attempted the reduction of Fort William.] The English general had only 800 men and a few Indian allies. In order to cope with superior numbers, he resorted to stratagem. A Frenchman had deserted to the Spaniards. To him the English general now wrote, as if to a spy. A Spanish prisoner in Oglethorpe's hands was liberated and bribed to deliver the letter to the deserter. The Frenchman was advised that two British fleets were coming to America, one to aid Oglethorpe and the other to attack St. Augustine. Let the Spaniards remain on the island but three days longer, and they would be ruined. If the enemy did not make an immediate attack on Frederica, his forces would be captured to a man. . . . This letter was delivered [to the Spanish commander], and the astonished Frenchman was arrested as a spy; but the Spaniards could not tell whether his denial was true or false. There was a council of war in the Spanish camp. Oglethorpe's stratagem was suspected, but could not be proved. Three ships had been seen at sea that day; perhaps these were the first vessels of the approaching British fleets. The Spaniards were utterly perplexed; but it was finally decided to take Oglethorpe's advice, and make the attack on Frederica. [They failed.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 29, p. 242.

5351. STRATAGEM, Successful. Fidelity. [When Marius had conquered the people of Rome, his fury was insatiable, especially against the prominent citizens.] On this occasion it was found that no obligations of friendship, no rights of hospitality, can stand the stock of ill-fortune. For there were very few who did not betray those that had taken refuge in their houses. The slaves of Cornutus, therefore, deserve the highest admiration. They hid their master in the house, and took a dead body out of the street from among the slain, and hanged it by the neck; then they put a gold ring upon the finger, and showed the corpse in that condition to Marius' executioners; after which they dressed it for the funeral, and buried it as their master's body. No one suspected the matter; and Cornutus, after being concealed as long as it was necessary, was conveyed by those servants into Galatia.—PLUTARCH'S CAIUS MARIUS.

5352. STRATEGY despised. Persians. In fight the ancient Persians displayed great personal courage. They esteemed it dishonorable to employ any stratagems in war, and never fought in the night, unless when attacked by the enemy.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 11, p. 120.

5353. STRATEGY, Needful. Columbus. As he foresaw that the vague terrors already awakened among the seamen would increase with the space which intervened between them and their homes, he commenced a stratagem which he continued throughout the voyage. He kept two reckonings: one correct, in which the true way of the ship was noted, and which was retained in secret for his own government; in the other, which was open to general inspection, a number of leagues was daily subtracted from the sailing of the ship, so that the crews were kept in ignorance of the real distance they had advanced.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 3, ch. 2.

5345. STREETS, Darkness of. Reign of Charles II. When the evening closed in, the difficulty and danger of walking about London became serious indeed. The garret windows were opened, and pails were emptied, with little regard to those who were passing below. Falls, bruises, and broken bones were of constant occurrence; for, till the last year of the reign of Charles II., most of the streets were left in profound darkness. Thieves and robbers plied their trade with impunity; yet they were hardly so terrible to peaceable citizens as another class of ruffians. It was a favorite amusement of dissolute young gentlemen to swagger by night about the town, breaking windows, upsetting sedans, beating quiet men, and offering rude caresses to pretty women. Several dynasties of these tyrants had, since the Restoration, domineered over the streets. The Muns and Tityre Tus had given place to the Hectors, and the Hectors had been recently succeeded by the Scourers. At a later period arose the Nicker, the Hawcubite, and the yet more dreaded name of Mohawk.—MACAULAY'S HIST., ch. 3, p. 336.

5355. STREETS, Filthy. Reign of Charles II. The drainage was so bad, that in rainy weather the gutters soon became torrents; . . . black rivulets roared down Snow Hill and Ludgate Hill, bearing to Fleet Ditch a vast tribute of animal and vegetable filth from the stalls of butchers and green-grocers. This flood was profusely thrown to right and left by coaches and carts. To keep as far from the carriage road as possible was therefore the wish of every pedestrian. The mild and timid gave the wall; the bold and athletic took it. If two roysterers met, they cocked their hats in each other's faces and pushed each other about till the weaker was shoved toward the kennel. If he was a mere bully, he sneaked off, muttering that he should find a time; if he was pugnacious, the encounter probably ended in a duel behind Montague House.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 335.

5356. STRENGTH, Consciousness of. Alexander. [At daybreak he was asleep.] Parmenio, having at last awakened him, and seeming surprised to find him in so calm and sweet a sleep, just as he was going to fight a battle, in which his whole fortune lay at stake: "How is it possible," said Alexander, "for us not to be calm since the enemy is coming to deliver himself into our hands?" Immediately he took up his arms, mounted his horse, and rode up and down the ranks, exhorting the troops to maintain, and, if possible, to surpass, their ancient fame and the glory they had hitherto acquired. Soldiers, on the day of battle, imagine they see the fate of the engagement painted in the face of their general. As for Alexander, he had never appeared so calm, so gay, nor so resolute. The serenity and security which they observed in him were in a manner so many assurances of the victory. There was a great difference between the two armies with respect to numbers, but much more so with regard to courage. That of Darius consisted at least of 600,000 foot and 40,000 horse, and the other of no more than 40,000 foot and 7000 or 8000 horse; but the latter was all fire and strength; whereas, on the side of the Persians, it was a prodigious assemblage of men, not of soldiers; an empty phantom rather than a real army. [Darius was defeated.]—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 8.

5357. STRENGTH by Piety. Cromwell. Charles II. fled in hopeless desolation to France, to exist as the pensioned pauper of the French king. The royal power was now fairly beaten down in England. Let the malignant sneerer, who has no words but commonplace abuse to bestow upon the great English hero, attempt to realize what the land would have been, must have been, without him, rent in factions, almost all equally strong. An army then without a leader, dreamy speculators determined to impose their theories upon the kingdom, and so inflict upon the land the miseries of anarchy, as in the French revolution; or the horrors of persecution, as in Boston and the New England States. Cromwell was the power raised up by Providence to save England from this. Never in the history of the world had a man a more difficult task to perform; but he performed it, because he brought to the task, in addition to the most remarkable combination of mental requisites ever assembled together in one man—forming a sort of mythic personage, and reminding us of Theseus or Hercules—in addition to these, we say, he brought piety of the sublimest order, and singleness of purpose lofty as that of a Hebrew prophet, but conjoined to a largeness of toleration for all religious differences, for which we know not where to find a parallel.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 12, p. 163.

5358. STRENGTH, Physical. Father of President Jefferson. This Peter Jefferson was a giant in stature and strength. It is said of him, that he could lift from their sides to an upright position two hogshheads of tobacco at once, each of a thousand pounds' weight.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 346.

5359. ———. Washington. The power of Washington's arm was displayed in several memorable instances: in his throwing a stone from the bed of the stream to the top of the Natural Bridge; another . . . across the Rappahannock, at Fredericksburg. . . . Numbers have since tried this feat, but none have cleared the water.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 25.

5360. STRIFE, Choice in. Enemies or Children. The general voice of the kingdom of France was now for peace; and the once haughty Louis [XIV.], now miserably humbled, sent his minister to negotiate in person at the Hague, where he met with the most mortifying treatment from Marlborough, Eugene, and the grand pensionary Heinsius. They demanded nothing less, as a condition of peace, than that the king of France should undertake, at his own charges, to dethrone his grandson Philip, and even limited him to the space of two months for the fulfilling of this condition. The spirit of the aged Louis broke out into the most just indignation at this inhuman and dishonorable proposal. "Since," says he, "I must die fighting, it shall be with mine enemies, and not with my children." He prepared, therefore, for a resolute continuance of that war which was only to involve him in fresh misfortunes. [War with England.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 34, p. 467.

5361. STRIFE, Conjugal. Reconciliation. The ancient worship of the Romans afforded a peculiar goddess to hear and reconcile the complaints of a married life; but her epithet of Viriplaca, the appeaser of husbands, too clearly indicates on which side submission and repentance are always expected.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 349.

5362. STRIFE, Family. Abominable. It being the season when the pilgrimage attracted to Mecca the Arabs from all parts of the desert, they agreed to post themselves upon the route, to the end of warning the pilgrims against the novelties which a pretended prophet, a nephew of Aboutaleb, was disseminating as a schism in the Kaaba. "Let us also," they deliberated, "be agreed, before leaving the city, upon what we shall say separately to the pilgrims, so that there may be no discrepancy between our several representations." "Will we say that he is a diviner? No, for he has neither the convulsive and incoherent accent, nor the language full of affected consonances of the diviners. Shall we say that he is a madman? But his entire exterior inspires dignity and reflection. Shall we say he is a poet? But he does not express himself in verse. Shall we say, in fine, that he is a wizard? But he does not work miracles; he practises none of the mysteries of magic; his sole magic lies in the eloquence and the persuasion of his lips. Let us say, then, that he is a public enemy, who, by his artifices, sows disunion among families, who poisons the affections, who severs brother from brother, son from father, wife from husband."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY.

5363. STRIFE, Premature. Bishop Burnet. [He was the private chaplain of the wife of William, Prince of Orange. The English were considering the question of filling the throne made vacant by the flight of James II. to France by crowning William of Orange and making Mary only queen consort, though she was the daughter of the fugitive king.] Said the brave and honest divine: "It would be unseemly in me to oppose any plan which may have your countenance. I therefore desire to be set free, that I may fight the princess' battle with every faculty that God has given me." "I think, doctor," said William, with characteristic coolness, "that you had better stay where you are. It will surely be time for you to quit me when I do something of which you disapprove." In a few hours the scheme which had excited Burnet's resentment was entirely given up, and all those who considered James as no longer king were agreed as to the way in which the throne must be filled. William and Mary must be king and queen.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 599.

5364. STRIFE, Responsibility for. James II. The seventeenth century has, in that unhappy country, left to the nineteenth a fatal heritage of malignant passions. No amnesty for the mutual wrongs inflicted by the Saxon defenders of Londonderry, and by the Celtic defenders of Limerick, has ever been granted from the heart by either race. To this day a more than Spartan haughtiness alloys the many noble qualities which characterize the children of the victors, while a Helot feeling, compounded of awe and hatred, is not too often discernible in the children of the vanquished. Neither of the hostile castes can justly be absolved from blame; but the chief blame is due to the short-sighted and headstrong prince [James II.] who, placed in a situation in which he might have reconciled them, employed all his power to inflame their animosity, and at length forced them to close in a grapple for life and death.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 117.

5365. STRUGGLE, Fierce. Paul Jones. On the 23d of September Paul Jones, cruising off the coast of Scotland with a flotilla of French and American vessels, fell in with a fleet of British merchantmen, convoyed by two men-of-war.

The battle that ensued was bloody beyond precedent in naval warfare. For an hour and a half the Serapis, a British frigate of forty-four guns, engaged the Poor Richard within musket-shot. Then the vessels, both in a sinking condition, were run alongside and lashed together. The marines fought with the fury of madmen, until the Serapis struck her colors. Jones hastily transferred his men to the conquered ship, and the Poor Richard went down. The remaining British ship was also attacked and captured. So desperate was the engagement, that of the 375 men on board the fleet of Jones 300 were either killed or wounded.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 42, p. 238.

5366. STRUGGLE, Hopeless. Battle of Fredericksburg. Night came and ended the useless carnage. General Burnside would have renewed the battle, but his division commanders finally dissuaded him, and on the night of the 15th [of December] the Federal army was silently withdrawn across the Rappahannock. The Union losses in this terrible conflict amounted to 1500 killed, 9100 wounded, and 1650 prisoners and missing. The Confederates lost in killed 595, 4061 wounded, and 653 missing and prisoners. Of all the important movements of the war, only that of Fredericksburg was undertaken with no probability of success. Under the plan of the battle—if plan it might be called—nothing could be reasonably expected but repulse, rout, and ruin. Thus, in gloom and disaster to the Federal cause, ended the great campaign of 1862.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 64, p. 510.

5367. STUDENT, Belated. Charlemagne. The literary merits of Charlemagne are attested by the foundation of schools, the introduction of arts, the works which were published in his name, and his familiar connection with the subjects and strangers whom he invited to his court to educate both the prince and people. His own studies were tardy, laborious, and imperfect; if he spoke Latin and understood Greek, he derived the rudiments of knowledge from conversation rather than from books; and in his mature age the emperor strove to acquire the practice of writing, which every peasant now learns in his infancy.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 49, p. 47.

5368. STUDENT, A royal. Charlemagne. Charlemagne was an indefatigable student; and the impulse of his personal example, patronage, and superintendence produced effects which, considering the circumstances of the times, are truly wonderful, and redound to his eternal honor. History presents to us few more striking spectacles than that of the great monarch of the West, surrounded by the princes and princesses of his family and the chief personages of his brilliant court, all content to sit as learners at the feet of their Anglo-Saxon preceptor Alcuin in the "school of the palace" at Aix-la-Chapelle.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 5, § 10, p. 73.

5369. STUDENTS, Folly of. Goldsmith. On one occasion we find him implicated in an affair that came nigh producing his expulsion. A report was brought to college that a scholar was in the hands of the bailiffs. This was an insult in which every gownsmen felt himself involved. A number of the scholars flew to arms, and sallied forth to battle, headed by a hare-brained fellow nick-named Gallows Walsh, noted for his aptness at mischief and fondness for riot. The stronghold of the bailiff was carried by storm, the scholar set at liberty, and the delinquent catchpole borne off captive to the college, where, having no pump to put him under, they satisfied the demands of collegiate law by ducking him in an old cistern. Flushed with this signal victory, Gallows Walsh now harangued his followers, and proposed to break open Newgate, or the Black Dog, as the prison was called, and effect a general jail delivery. He was answered by shouts of concurrence, and away went the throng of madcap youngsters, fully bent upon putting an end to the tyranny of law. They were joined by the mob of the city, and made an attack upon the prison with true Irish precipitation and thoughtlessness, never having provided themselves with cannon to batter its stone walls. A few shots from the prison brought them to their senses, and they beat a hasty retreat, two of the townsmen being killed and several wounded.—IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 2, p. 24.

5370. STUDIES, Ancient. Reign of Theodoric. [Boethius was an honored scholar.] For the benefit of his Latin readers, his genius submitted to teach the first elements of the arts and sciences of Greece. The geometry of Euclid, the music of Pythagoras, the arithmetic of Nicomachus, the mechanics of Archimedes, the astronomy of Ptolemy, the theology of Plato, and the logic of Aristotle, with the commentary of Porphyry, were translated and illustrated by the indefatigable pen of the Roman senator. And he alone was esteemed capable of describing the wonders of art, a sun-dial, a water-clock, or a sphere which represented the motions of the planets. . . . Such conspicuous merit was felt and rewarded by a discerning prince; the dignity of Boethius was adorned with the titles of consul and patrician, and his talents were usefully employed in the important station of master of the offices.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 33.

5371. STUDY, Devoted to. Thomas Jefferson. Upon the completion of his college course, he studied law for five years, with an assiduity most unusual in the heir to a good estate. He had a clock in his bedroom, and his rule in summer was to get up as soon as he could see the hands, and in winter he rose uniformly at five. Including the time passed in music and reading, he usually spent fourteen hours of every day at his studies; three of which, he tells us, were sometimes spent in practising on the violin. There has seldom been a young man of fortune who lived more purely than he. He neither practised the vices nor indulged the passions of his class in the Virginia of that day. He never quarrelled; he never gambled. His mouth was innocent of tobacco. He never drank to excess.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 347.

5372. ———. President Madison. Of all the public men who have figured in public life in the United States, he was the most studious and thoughtful. The eldest son of a rich Virginia planter, he was yet so devoted to the acquisition of knowledge that, for months together at Princeton College, he allowed himself but three hours' sleep out of the twenty-four—an excess which injured his health for all the rest of his life. He appeared to live wholly in the world of ideas. Daniel Webster reckoned him the ablest expounder of the Constitution, and Thomas Jefferson pronounced him the best head in Virginia. Without being a brilliant orator, he was an excellent argumentative speaker, and always conciliated the feelings of his opponents by the gentleness of his demeanor and the courtesy of his language.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 518.

5373. STUDY, Preparation by. John Milton. With aspirations thus vast, though unformed, with "amplitude of mind to greatest deeds," Milton retired to his father's house in the country. Five more years of self-education, added to the seven years of academical residence, were not too much for the meditation of projects such as Milton was already conceiving. Years many more than twelve, filled with great events and distracting interests, were to pass over before the body and shape of "Paradise Lost" was given to these imaginings.—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 2.

5374. ———. John Milton. Until he was thirty-one John Milton was a student, and nothing but a student; first, at home, at his father's side; next at a great London grammar-school; then at Cambridge University; afterward at his father's house in the country; and finally in foreign countries. During all this long period of preparation he was a most diligent, earnest, and intense student. He was probably the best Latin scholar that ever lived who was not a native Roman of Cicero's day.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 168.

5375. ———. Napoleon I. [His entire early life was devoted to intense study. When twenty-two years of age he was promoted to a first lieutenancy, and visited his native land on furlough.] Upon returning to the home of his childhood, to spend a few months in rural leisure, the first object of his attention was to prepare for himself a study, where he could be secluded from all interruption. For this purpose he selected a room in the attic of the house . . . he passed days and nights of the most incessant mental toil. He sought no recreation; he seldom went out; he seldom saw any company.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

5376. STUPIDITY, Hopeless. Reign of James II. [The invasion of England by William of Orange was welcomed by conspicuous men who deserted James II.] The impenetrable stupidity of Prince George served his turn on this occasion better than cunning would have done. It was his habit, when any news was told him, to exclaim in French, "Est-il possible?" "Is it possible?" This catchword was now of great use to him. "Est-il possible?" he cried, when he had been made to understand that Churchill and Grafton [James' generals] were missing. And when the ill tidings came from Warminster he again ejaculated, "Est-il possible?" . . . Prince George and Ormond were invited to sup with the king at Andover. The meal must have been a sad one. The king was overwhelmed by his misfortunes. His son-in-law was the dullest of companions. "I have tried Prince George sober," said Charles II., "and I have tried him drunk; and, drunk or sober, there is nothing in him." Ormond, who was through life taciturn and bashful, was not likely to be in high spirits at such a moment. At length the repast terminated. The king retired to rest. Horses were in waiting for the prince and Ormond, who, as soon as they left the table mounted and rode off. [They deserted to the king's enemy.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 477.

5377. STYLE, Adaptation of. Luther. I would have such a translation as would deserve to be read by all Christians, for I hope we would be able to present to Germany a better translation than is the Latin version. It is a great work, and worthy of our united labors, since it ought everywhere to be found and to conduce to the general welfare of the people. In two months Luther had completed the translation of the New Testament. "I translated not only St. John's Gospel," says Luther, "but the entire New Testament, while I was in Patmos [his place of concealment]. And now Philip [Melancthon] and I have begun to polish it off, and with God's help it will be a fine piece of work. For my fellow-Germans was I born, and them will I serve!" And in order that he might do this right well, he questioned the mother at home, the children in the streets, and the common laborer in the market. The terms of court and palace he could not use, said he. And thus he accomplished the completion of a truly popular, glorious work, which proved to be the foundation and corner-stone of his Reformation labors.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 10, p. 99.

5378. SUBJUGATION intolerable. Reign of James II. [Irish troops were brought over to aid James in supplanting the Protestant religion.] The Englishman . . . knew that great numbers of Irish had repeatedly fled before a small English force, and that the whole Irish population had been held down by a small English colony; and he very complacently inferred that he was naturally a being of a higher order than the Irishman; for it is thus that a dominant race always explains its ascendancy and excuses its tyranny. That in vivacity, humor, and eloquence the Irish stand high among the nations of the world, is now universally acknowledged. That, when well disciplined, they are excellent soldiers, has been proved on a hundred fields of battle; yet it is certain that, a century and a half ago, they were generally despised in our island as both a stupid and a cowardly people. And these were the men who were to hold England down by main force while her civil and ecclesiastical constitution was destroyed. The blood of the whole nation boiled at the thought.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 394.

5379. SUBJUGATION, Oppressive. Mahomet II. the Great. The Greeks remained under the dominion of the grand signior in a state of oppression little short of slavery; they were suffered, however, to retain their religion and their laws. They were allowed, paying a small tribute, to carry on a little commerce and cultivate their lands. The patriarch's revenues must, at least, have been considerable, as he paid, at his installation, no less than 8000 ducats, one half to the exchequer of the grand signior, and the other to the officers of the Porte. The greatest subjection the Greeks have been under was in the tribute of children. Every father has been compelled to give one of his sons to serve among the janizaries or in the seraglio, or to pay a sum for his ransom.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13, p. 211.

5380. SUBLIMITY, Influence of. *Pyramids. The whole army instinctively halted and gazed awe-stricken upon those monuments of antiquity. The face of Napoleon beamed with enthusiasm. "Soldiers," he exclaimed, as he rode along the ranks, "from those summits forty centuries contemplate your actions!" The ardor of the soldiers was aroused to the highest pitch.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 11.

5381. SUBMISSION, Humiliating. *Richard II. Though a prince of some spirit, he was possessed of a very weak understanding, abandoned to his pleasures, and a slave to unworthy favorites. By their persuasion, and to gratify his revenge as well as his avarice, he confiscated, on a specious pretence of treason, the estate of his uncle, Henry of Lancaster, Duke of Hereford, a prince of great resolution and ability, and, by descent from Henry III., of no remote pretensions to the throne of England. While the king was employed in quelling an insurrection in Ireland, Henry of Lancaster, who was in high favor with the people, found means to levy a very formidable army; he engaged the Earl of Northumberland in his interest, and prevailed on York, then viceroy in the king's absence, to give him no opposition; while, as he pretended, all that he had in view was the recovery of his estate. Richard, on his return from Ireland, found Lancaster at the head of his troops, determined to wrest from him the possession of the crown; his numbers were inconsiderable, and diminished by desertion to his rival. Resistance he saw was vain while the body of the people were his enemies. Lancaster told him he was a novice in the art of government, and that he would teach him how to rule the people of England; to which the submissive monarch is said to have replied, "Fair cousin, since it pleases you, it pleases us likewise." Richard, confined in the Tower, was accused of maladministration, and condemned by Parliament, who solemnly deposed him from the throne; he was confined a prisoner in the castle of Pontefract, and afterward privately assassinated.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 12, p. 201.

5382. SUBMISSION of Soul. *Penitential. [Rev. Freeborn Garretson was a Maryland farmer when he became awakened to a sense of his personal need of salvation.] Under the preaching of the Rev. Daniel Ruff he was "so oppressed he could scarcely support his burden;" and riding homeward through a lonely wood, agonized by a sense of his sinfulness and of the necessity of regeneration, he dismounted and began to pray. But his prayer was for forbearance that he might yet delay till a more convenient season. Resuming his ride, he was again arrested with an overpowering consciousness that "now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." "I threw," he says, "the reins of my bridle on the horse's neck, and putting my hands together, cried out, Lord, I submit!" . . . "The enmity of my heart was slain, the plan of salvation was open to me." . . . "My soul was so exceeding happy that it seemed as if I wanted to take wing and fly away to heaven."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 354.

5383. SUBSTITUTE, A happy. *Persecution. Queen Mary, having dealt severely with the Protestants in England, about the latter end of her reign signed a commission for to take the same course with them in Ireland; and to execute the same with greater force, she nominates Dr. Cole one of the commissioners. This doctor coming with the commission to Chester, on his journey, the mayor of that city, hearing that her Majesty was sending a messenger into Ireland, and he being a churchman, waited on the doctor, who, in discourse with the mayor, taketh out of a cloak-bag a leather box, saying unto him, "Here is a commission that will lash the heretics of Ireland" (calling the Protestants by that title). The good woman of the house, being well affected to the Protestant religion, and also having a brother, named John Edmonds, of the same, then a citizen in Dublin, was much troubled at the doctor's words; but watching her convenient time, while the mayor took his leave and the doctor complimented him down-stairs, she opens the box, takes the commission out, and places in lieu thereof a sheet of paper with a pack of cards wrapped up therein, the knave of clubs being faced uppermost. The doctor coming up to his chamber, suspecting nothing of what had been done, put up the box as formerly. The next day, going to the water-side, wind and weather serving him, he sails toward Ireland. . . . He presents the box unto the lord deputy, who causing it to be opened, that the secretary might read the commission, there was nothing save a pack of cards, with the knave of clubs uppermost; which not only startled the lord deputy and council, but the doctor, who assured them he had a commission, but knew not how it was gone. Then the lord-deputy made answer, "Let us have another commission, and we will shuffle the cards in the mean while." The doctor, being troubled in his mind, went away, and returned into England.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 303.

5384. SUCCESS, Changes by. *Columbus. One can hardly recognize in the individual thus made the companion of princes, and the theme of general wonder and admiration, the same obscure stranger who but a short time before had been a common scoff and jest in this very court, derided by some as an adventurer, and pointed at by others as a madman. Those who had treated him with contumely during his long course of solicitation now sought to efface the remembrance of it by adulations. Every one who had given him a little cold countenance or a few courtly smiles now arrogated to himself the credit of having been a patron and of having promoted the discovery of the New World.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 5, ch. 7.

5385. SUCCESS, Dangerous. *Rivalry. It was in 1813, when, in consequence of the presence of two large armies, a malignant typhus fever raged, and the sick became so numerous that it was necessary to divide them among the city physicians. Seventy-three cases fell to the share of Dr. Hahnemann, all of whom he treated on the homeopathic system, and all of whom recovered, except one old man. This striking success, while it increased the number of his disciples, inflamed the fury of his enemies, and he could not go into the streets without being hooted at and insulted. Compelled again to take flight, he found refuge at the obscure capital of one of his disciples, the Duke of Anhalt. But even there he was not safe from persecution. Several times the windows of his house were broken, and he seldom ventured out of doors.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 275.

5386. ——. Alcibiades. When Timon, famed for his misanthropy, saw Alcibiades . . . conducted home with great honor from the place of assembly, he did not shun him, as he did other men, but went up to him, and shaking him by the hand, thus addressed him: "Go on, my brave boy, and prosper; for your prosperity will bring on the ruin of all this crowd." This occasioned several reflections; some laughed, some railed, and others were extremely moved at the saying. So various were the judgments formed of Alcibiades, by reason of the inconsistency of his character.—PLUTARCH'S ALCIBIADES.

5387. SUCCESS, Dangers of. Demoralization. Dundee knew the qualities of the race [Highlanders] which he was going to lead against the regular troops of the new government [that of William III.]. They were most to be feared in the hour of success. "In battle the point to which they bend their utmost efforts, and which they are most anxious to carry, is their enemies' baggage. If that once falls into their hands, disregarding all discipline and oaths, and leaving their colors, home they run."—CUNNINGHAM, IN KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 6, p. 92.

5388. SUCCESS, Delusive. Charles Goodyear. [He met many discouragements in experimenting with india-rubber, and was brought to bitterest poverty.] Another time Mr. Goodyear thought he had succeeded in curing india-rubber by mixing it with quicklime. He made some specimens of india-rubber cloth, which had an elegant appearance; but after enjoying his triumph a few days he found, to his dismay, that the weakest acid, such as apple-juice, orange-juice, or vinegar and water, dropped upon his cloth, dissolved it into soft gum again.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 217.

5389. SUCCESS deserved. Benjamin Franklin in Philadelphia. On the deep foundations of sobriety, frugality, and industry the young [run-away] journeyman [seventeen years old] built his fortunes and his fame; and he soon came to have a printing-office of his own. Toiling early and late, with his own hands he set types and worked at the press; with his own hands he would trundle to the office in a wheelbarrow the reams of paper which he was to use. His ingenuity was such that he could form letters, make types and woodcuts, and engrave vignettes in copper. The assembly of Pennsylvania respected his merit, and chose him its printer.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 23.

5390. SUCCESS, Disaster a. Queen Anne's War. A.D. 1711. [An English squadron, under Sir Hovenden Walker, ascended the St. Lawrence to attack Quebec. By his incompetency and obstinacy] eight ships had been wrecked and eight hundred and eighty-four men drowned. A council of war voted unanimously that it was impossible to proceed. "Had we arrived safe at Quebec," wrote the admiral, "ten or twelve thousand men must have been left to perish of cold and hunger; by the loss of part, Providence saved all the rest!" and he expected public honors for his successful retreat, which to him seemed as glorious as a victory.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

5391. SUCCESS by Duplicity. Louis XI. He was a consummate master of the arts of dissimulation and duplicity; he made it the main business of his life to overreach and circumvent others, and accounted successful fraud the most conspicuous proof of talent. Where his predecessors would have employed violence, Louis trusted to cajolery, corruption, and perfidy. He understood to perfection how to play off one class of interest against another; how to scatter the seeds of division and estrangement so as to profit afterward by the discord he had fomented. Louis realized his objects as a sovereign by sacrificing without scruple all his obligations as a man.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 12, § 1.

5392. SUCCESS, Encouraging. Battle of Trenton. About the 20th of December the weather became very cold, and by the evening of the 25th the river was filled with floating ice. . . . Washington's division succeeded in getting over, but the passage was delayed till three o'clock in the morning. All hope of reaching Trenton before daybreak was at an end; but Washington, believing that the Hessians would sleep late after their revels, divided his army into two columns, and pressed forward. One division, led by Sullivan, passed down the river to attack the town on the west; the other, commanded by Washington and Greene, made a circuit to the Princeton road. The movement was entirely successful. Nearly a thousand of the dreaded Hessians threw down their arms and begged for mercy. Before nightfall Washington, with his victorious men and the whole body of captives, was safe on the other side of the Delaware. The battle of Trenton roused the nation from despondency. Confidence in the commander and hope in the ultimate success of the American cause were everywhere revived.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 39, p. 316.

5393. SUCCESS, Fortunate. Roman Emperor Honorius. The remainder of the reign of Honorius was undisturbed by rebellion; and it may be observed that, in the space of five years, seven usurpers had yielded to the fortune of a prince, who was himself incapable either of counsel or of action.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 307.

5394. SUCCESS, Genius for. Frederick the Great. The net seemed to have closed completely round him. The Russians were in the field, and were spreading devastation through his eastern provinces. Silesia was overrun by the Austrians. A great French army was advancing from the west under the command of Marshal Soubise, a prince of the great Armorican house of Rohan. Berlin itself had been taken and plundered by the Croats. Such was the situation from which Frederick extricated himself, with dazzling glory, in the short space of thirty days. [He defeated the French November 5, and the Austrians on December 5.] —MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 97.

5395. SUCCESS by Gentleness. Missionaries. On a low island of barren gneiss-rock off the west coast of Scotland an Irish refugee, Columba, had raised the famous mission-station of Iona. It was within its walls that Oswald in youth found refuge, and on his accession to the throne of Northumbria he called for missionaries from among its monks. The first preacher sent in answer to his call obtained little success. He declared on his return that among a people so stubborn and barbarous as the Northumbrian folk success was impossible. "Was it their stubbornness or your severity?" asked Aidan, a brother sitting by; "did you forget God's word to give them the milk first and then the meat?" All eyes turned on the speaker as fittest to undertake the abandoned mission, and Aidan, sailing at their bidding, fixed his bishop's see in the island-peninsula of Lindisfarne. Thence, from a monastery which gave to this spot its after name of Holy Island, preachers poured forth over the heathen realms. [He had great success.]—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 50.

5396. SUCCESS vs. Happiness. Cyrus. Cyrus wanted this kind of glory. He himself informs us, that during the whole course of his life, which was pretty long, the happiness of it was never interrupted by any unfortunate accident; and that in all his designs the success had answered his utmost expectation. But he acquaints us at the same time with another thing almost incredible, and which was the source of all that moderation and evenness of temper so conspicuous in him, and for which he can never be sufficiently admired—namely, that in the midst of his uninterrupted prosperity he still preserved in his heart a secret fear, proceeding from the apprehension of the changes and misfortunes that might happen; and this prudent fear was not only a preservative against insolence, but even against intemperate joy.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 4, art. 3, § 3.

5397. SUCCESS, Jealousy of. Columbus. Columbus sailed a second time, with a fleet of seventeen ships, and returned after the discovery of the Caribbee Islands and of Jamaica. But his enemies, jealous of the reputation he had acquired, had prevailed on the court of Spain to send along with his fleet an officer, who, in the character of justiciary, might establish such regulations in the new colonies as were most for the advantage of the Spanish Government. This officer, on account of some differences between Columbus and his soldiers, put the admiral in irons on board his own ship, and returned with him a prisoner to Spain. The court, it is true, repaired this affront in the best manner possible.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21, p. 305.

5398. SUCCESS, Joys of. Columbus. As he approached the shore, Columbus, who was disposed for all kinds of agreeable impressions, was delighted with the purity and suavity of the atmosphere, the crystal transparency of the sea, and the extraordinary beauty of the vegetation. He beheld also fruits of an unknown kind upon the trees which overhung the shores. On landing he threw himself on his knees, kissed the earth, and returned thanks to God with tears of joy. His example was followed by the rest, whose hearts indeed overflowed with the same feelings of gratitude. . . . The feelings of the crew now burst forth in the most extravagant transports. They had recently considered themselves devoted men, hurrying forward to destruction; they now looked upon themselves as favorites of fortune, and gave themselves up to the most unbounded joy. They thronged around the admiral with overflowing zeal, some embracing him, others kissing his hands. Those who had been most mutinous and turbulent during the voyage were now most devoted and enthusiastic.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 3, ch. 5.

5399. SUCCESS, Lines of. General Grant. [After fifteen years' military service he resigned his commission, and became a farmer near St. Louis.] His farming did not seem to prosper much, for his crops were not enough to keep the farm going; so he hauled wood in winter to Carondelet, and sold it by the cord. . . . But even this was not sufficient to support him comfortably, and so he became collector of other peoples' debts. But he was such a poor hand at dunning . . . there seemed a very poor lookout for him. [He succeeded in war, if not in peace.]—HEADLEY'S GENERAL GRANT, p. 41.

5400. SUCCESS, Misunderstood. Hannibal. After this great success [in vanquishing the Roman army] Hannibal's friends advised him to pursue his fortune, and to enter Rome along with the fugitives, assuring him that in five days he might sup in the Capitol. It is not easy to conjecture what his reason was for not taking this step. Most probably some deity opposed it, and therefore inspired him with this hesitation and timidity. On this account it was that a Carthaginian, named Barca, said to him, with some heat, "Hannibal, you know how to gain a victory, but not how to use it."—PLUTARCH'S FABIVS MAXIMUS.

5401. SUCCESS a Necessity. Revolution. The news of the execution of Louis XVI. was received in France with awe and terror, and excited throughout Europe an outcry of grief and indignation. Apart from its scandalous injustice and cruelty, the crime was regarded, both at home and abroad, as an act of hostile defiance launched against all thrones and all established governments; it placed France in a position of universal aggression and antagonism. "There is no going back now," exclaimed [Jean Paul] Marat; "we must either prevail or perish!" And the army sent a deputation to thank the Convention for having reduced them to the necessity of conquering.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 17, § 1.

5402. SUCCESS overruled. Alexander. Alexander, after having left Patala, marched through the country of the Oritæ. . . . Here he was in such want of provisions, that he lost a great number of soldiers, and brought back from India scarce the fourth part of his army, which had consisted of 120,000 foot and 15,000 horse. Sickiness, bad food, and the excessive heats had swept them away in multitudes; but famine made a still greater havoc among the troops in this barren country, which was neither ploughed nor sowed, its inhabitants being savages, who fared very hard, and led a most uncomfortable life. After they had eaten all the palm-tree roots that could be met with, they were obliged to feed upon the beasts of burden, and next upon their war horses; and when they had no beasts left to carry their baggage, they were forced to burn those rich spoils, for the sake of which the Macedonians had run to the extremities of the earth. The plague, the usual attendant upon famine, completed the calamity of the soldiers, and destroyed great numbers of them.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 17.

5403. SUCCESS by Perseverance. Demosthenes. The first essay of his eloquence was against his guardians, whom he obliged to refund a part of his fortune. Encouraged by this success, he ventured to speak before the people, but with very ill fortune. He had a weak voice, an impediment in his speech, and a very short breath; notwithstanding which, his periods were so long, that he was often obliged to stop in the midst of them to take breath. This occasioned his being hissed by the whole audience, from whence he retired discouraged, and determined to renounce forever a function of which he believed himself incapable. One of his auditors, who, through all these imperfections, had observed an excellent fund of genius in him, and a kind of eloquence which came very near that of Pericles, gave him new spirit from the grateful idea of so glorious a resemblance, and the good advice which he added to it. He ventured, therefore, to appear a second time before the people, and was no better received than before. As he withdrew, hanging down his head, and in the utmost confusion, Satyrus, one of the most excellent actors of those times, who was his friend [gave him encouragement and advice]. He stammered to such a degree, that he could not pronounce some letters, among others that with which the name of the art he studied begins; and he was so short-breathed that he could not utter a whole period without stopping. He at length overcame these obstacles by putting small pebbles into his mouth, and pronouncing several verses in that manner without interruption; and that even when walking, and going up steep and difficult places; so that, at last, no letter made him hesitate, and his breath held out through the longest periods. He went also to the seaside, and while the waves were in the most violent agitation he pronounced harangues, to accustom himself, by the confused noise of the waters, to the roar of the people and the tumultuous cries of public assemblies. Demosthenes took no less care of his actions than of his voice. He had a large looking-glass in his house, which served to teach him gesture, and at which he used to declaim before he spoke in public. To correct a fault which he had contracted by an ill habit, of continually shrugging his shoulders, he practised standing upright in a kind of very narrow pulpit or rostrum, over which hung a halbert, in such a manner that, if in the heat of action that motion escaped him, the point of the weapon might serve at the same time to admonish and correct him.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 13, § 7.

5404. SUCCESS, Premature. Charles Goodyear. Coming to his shop one morning, an Irishman in his employ met him at the door in high spirits, saying that he had found out the great secret and beaten a Yankee, pointing to his trousers, which he had dipped into one of the barrels of sap. They were so nicely coated over with the glistening gum, that for a moment Mr. Goodyear thought that perhaps Jerry had blundered into the secret. The man sat down to his work on the top of a cask. On attempting to rise, a few minutes after, he found himself glued to his seat, and his legs stuck tight together. He had to be cut out of his trousers, amid the laughter of the bystanders.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 217.

5405. SUCCESS, Proof of. Elias Howe. All the winter of 1844-45 Mr. Howe worked at his machine. His conception of what he intended to produce was so clear and complete, that he was little delayed by failures, but worked on with almost as much certainty and steadiness as though he had a model before him. In April he sewed a seam by his machine. By the middle of May, 1845, he had completed his work. In July he sewed by his machine all the seams of two suits of woollen clothes—one suit for Mr. Fisher and the other for himself, the sewing of both of which outlasted the cloth.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 682.

5406. SUCCESS, Remarkable. Civil War. From the 20th of June to the 1st of December [1861] General Price's army marched over eight hundred miles [in Missouri], averaging 10,000 men during the time. . . . They fought five battles and at least thirty skirmishes. . . . Not a week passed without engagements of some sort. They started without a dollar, without a wagon or team, without a cartridge [having rifles, shotguns, etc.], without a bayonet-gun. On the 1st of September they had about eight thousand bayonet-guns, fifty pieces of cannon, four hundred tents, . . . for nearly all of which they were indebted to their own strong arms in battle and to the prodigality of the enemy.—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 5, p. 153.

5407. — — — Goethe. A man who, in early life, rising almost at a single bound into the highest reputation over all Europe; by gradual advances, fixing himself more and more firmly in the reverence of his countrymen, ascends silently through many vicissitudes to the supreme intellectual place among them; and now, after half a century, distinguished by convulsions, political, moral, and poetical, still reigns, full of years and honors, with a soft, undisputed sway; still laboring in his vocation, still forwarding, as with kingly benignity, whatever can profit the culture of his nation; such a man might justly attract our notice, were it only by the singularity of his fortune.—CARLYLE'S GOETHE, ch. 1.

5408. SUCCESS, Reputation by. Washington. When [Louis] Kossuth visited the tomb of Washington, he stood silent before it for several minutes, and then said, as he turned to leave the place, "How necessary it is to be successful!" —CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 306.

5409. SUCCESS, Reputation by. English Yankees. Yorkshiremen are the Yankees of old England; they are sharper, tougher, more enterprising and persevering, less amiable and polite, than the people of the more southern counties of England. Some of them are exceedingly hard bargainers, and very rough in their manners. Take them for all in all, however, they are the people that contribute most to the strength and prosperity of the British empire; and it is not uncommon to meet among them men in whom are happily united the force of a Yorkshireman with the suavity of a man of Kent or Sussex.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 306.

5410. SUCCESS, Steps to. Dr. Morton. [In the discovery of ether.] The thought occurred to the young man one day, that perhaps a way might be discovered of lessening human sensibility to pain. He had not received a scientific education, nor had he more scientific knowledge than an intelligent young man would naturally possess who had passed through the ordinary schools of a New England town. Instead of resorting to books, or consulting men of science, he began, from time to time, to experiment with various well-known substances. First he tried draughts of wine and brandy, sometimes to the intoxication of the patient; but as soon as the instrument was applied, consciousness revived, and long before the second tooth was out, the patient, though not perfectly aware of what was going on, was roaring with agony. He tried laudanum in doses of two hundred and three hundred drops, and opium in masses of ten grains, frequently renewing the dose until the patient would be in a condition truly deplorable. Dr. Morton records in his diary, that on one occasion he gave a lady five hundred drops of laudanum in forty-five minutes, which did indeed lessen the pain of the operation, but it took her a whole week to recover from the effects of the narcotic.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 635.

5411. SUCCESS, Surprising. Romans. [The first Punic war.] Thus, the Romans, after a war of twenty-four years, begun under every disadvantage, destitute of finances, totally unprovided with a fleet, and, of course, ignorant of navigation, were, at length, able to prescribe the most humiliating terms to Carthage, the first maritime power in the world.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 371.

5412. SUCCESS vs. Tactics. Napoleon I. [After the battle of Lodi] said an Austrian general indignantly: . . . "This beardless boy ought to have been beaten over and over again; for who ever saw such tactics! The blockhead knows nothing of the rules of war. To-day he is in our rear, to-morrow on our flank, and the next day again in our front. Such gross violations of the established principles of war are insufferable."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

5413. SUCCESS, Unenjoyed. Julius Cæsar. He was growing weary of the thankless burden. He was heard often to say that he had lived long enough. Men of high nature do not find the task of governing their fellow-creatures particularly delightful.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 26.

5414. SUCCESS, Want of. General Grant. A strong man by nature, . . . he had to learn by failures how to win ultimate success. . . . We find that both he and Sherman, who, at the close of the war, stood up as our foremost generals, came very near being removed from command for their mistakes, or, at least, want of success. . . . The Government was determined to consign Grant to disgrace, and would have done so but for the strenuous, persistent efforts of a single friend, Mr. Washburne.—HEADLEY'S GENERAL GRANT, p. 25.

5415. SUCCESS by Weakness. British. During many years the great British monarchy, under four successive princes of the house of Stuart, was scarcely a more important member of the European system than the little kingdom of Scotland had previously been. This, however, is little to be regretted. Of James I., as of John, it may be said, that if his administration had been able and splendid, it would probably have been fatal to our country, and that we owe more to his weaknesses and meannesses than to the wisdom and courage of much better sovereigns.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 65.

5416. SUCCESS, Well-earned. Andrew Johnson. On the day after the assassination of Mr. Lincoln, Andrew Johnson took the oath of office, and became President of the United States. He was a native of North Carolina, born in Raleigh on the 29th of December, 1808. With no advantages of education, he passed his boyhood in poverty and neglect. In 1826 he removed with his mother to Tennessee, and settled at Greenville. Here he was married to an intelligent lady, who taught him to write and cipher. Here, by dint of native talent, force of will, and strength of character, he first earned the applause of his fellow-men.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 67, p. 544.

5417. SUFFERINGS, Unspeakable. Dr. Mott. He was one of the eminent men commissioned by the government to examine the prisoners of war whom Jefferson Davis had starved and tortured at Andersonville, Salisbury, and Belle Isle. On his return, he was asked whether the newspaper reports of their condition were exaggerated. "My dear boy," he exclaimed, with horror depicted on his countenance, "you can form no idea of the poor, shrivelled, wasted victims. In the whole course of my surgical experience, not excepting the most painful operations on deformed limbs, I have never suffered so much in my life at the sight of anything, I care not what it is. It unnerved me. I felt sick." This, remember, was the testimony of a man who, for a period of sixty-five years, had been in the constant habit of witnessing human suffering in every form, who had lived in the hospitals of the great cities, and who was a gentleman of unimpeachable veracity.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 532.

5418. SUFFRAGE, Perils of universal. Peter Stuyvesant. A.D. 1653. [The colonists demanded] "that no new laws should be enacted but with the consent of the people, that none shall be appointed to office but with the approbation of the people." . . . Stuyvesant was taken by surprise. He had . . . doubts of man's capacity for self-government. . . . His reply, . . . "Shall the people elect their own officers? If . . . the election of magistrates be left to the rabble, every man will vote for one of his own stamp. The thief will vote for a thief, the smuggler for a smuggler, and fraud and vice will become privileged."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 15.

5419. SUFFRAGE, Universal. Virginia. Virginia was the first State in the world, composed of separate boroughs, diffused over an extensive surface, where the government was organized on the principle of universal suffrage. All free-men, without exception, were entitled to vote. An attempt was once made to limit the right to house-keepers; but the public voice reprobated the restriction; the very next year it was decided to be "hard, and unagreeable to reason, that any person should pay equal taxes, and yet have no votes in elections," and the electoral franchise was restored.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 6.

5420. SUICIDE averted. Napoleon I. [He had been degraded in rank after arrest on false charges. He sought military employment, and was set aside for the favorites of the government. He was impoverished, humiliated, and discouraged.] Urged by animal instinct to escape prospects so gloomy, and from sorrows, I wandered along the bank of the river, feeling that it was unmanly to commit suicide, and yet unable to resist the temptation to do so. In a few more moments I should have thrown myself into the water, when I ran against an individual dressed like a simple mechanic. [It proved to be a former comrade in his artillery regiment.] He had emigrated, and had returned to France in disguise to see his aged mother. [He offered Napoleon a belt of gold for the relief of his exiled mother, which was joyfully accepted, . . . and afterward repaid tenfold.]—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 3.

5421. SUICIDE, Cause of. Samuel Johnson. We talked of the melancholy end of a gentleman who had destroyed himself. JOHNSON: "It was owing to imaginary difficulties in his affairs, which, had he talked of with any friend, would soon have vanished." BOSWELL: "Do you think, sir, that all who commit suicide are mad?" JOHNSON: "Sir, they are often not universally disordered in their intellects, but one passion presses so upon them, that they yield to it, and commit suicide, as a passionate man will stab another."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 209.

5422. SUICIDE, Cowardice of. American Indians. The savage believed that to every man there is an appointed time to die; to anticipate that period by suicide was the meanest kind of cowardice.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

5423. SUICIDE deterred. Benjamin Abbott. [One of the most useful Methodist ministers during his Christian life was an exceedingly wicked man in his previous life. He long struggled with an awakened conscience]. "Satan suggested to me that my day of grace was over; therefore I might pray and cry, but he was sure of me at last." In passing through a lonely wood at night he was tempted to commit suicide; but while looking for a suitable place for the deed, he was deterred by an inward voice, which said, "This torment is nothing compared to hell."—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 198.

5424. SUICIDE, Dyspeptic's. Mr. Beauclerk said [to Samuel Johnson]: Mr. —, who loved buttered muffins, but durst not eat them because they disagreed with his stomach, resolved to shoot himself; and then he eat three buttered muffins for breakfast, before shooting himself, knowing that he should not be troubled with indigestion; he had two charged pistols; one was found lying charged upon the table by him, after he had shot himself with the other.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 410.

5425. SUICIDE, Escape by. Demosthenes. [Having, in the downfall of Greece, fled for sanctuary to the temple of Neptune. Soldiers came to arrest him. He asked them to wait until he had sent his last message to his family.] Then he retired into the inner part of the temple; and taking some paper, as if he meant to write, he put the pen in his mouth, and bit it a considerable time, as he used to do when thoughtful about his composition; after which he covered his head and put it in a reclining posture. The soldiers who stood at the door, apprehending that he took these methods to put off the fatal stroke, laughed at him, and called him a coward. Archias then approaching him desired him to rise, and began to repeat the promises of making his peace with Antipater. Demosthenes, who by this time felt the operation of the poison he had taken strong upon him, uncovered his face, and looking upon Archias, "Now," said he, "you may act the part of Creon in the play as soon as you please, and cast out this carcass of mine unburied. For my part, O gracious Neptune! I quit thy temple with my breath within me. But Antipater and the Macedonians would not have scrupled to profane it with murder." By this time he could scarcely stand, and therefore desired them to support him. But, in attempting to walk out, he fell by the altar, and expired with a groan.—PLUTARCH.

5426. SUICIDE, Glorification of. Stoicism. Its favorite theme was the glorification of suicide, which wiser moralists had severely reprobated, but which many Stoics belauded as the one sure refuge against oppression and outrage. It was a philosophy which was indeed able to lacerate the heart with a righteous indignation against the crimes and follies of mankind, but which vainly strove to resist, and which scarcely even hoped to stem, the ever-swelling tide of vice and misery. For wretchedness it had no pity; on vice it looked with impotent disdain.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 1, p. 9.

5427. SUICIDE, Mania for. William Cowper. First he bought laudanum, and had gone out into the fields with the intention of swallowing it, when the love of life suggested another way of escaping the dreadful ordeal. He might sell all he had, fly to France, change his religion, and bury himself in a monastery. He went home to pack up; but while he was looking over his portmanteau, his mood changed, and he again resolved on self-destruction. Taking a coach, he ordered the coachman to drive to the Tower Wharf, intending to throw himself into the river. But the love of life once more interposed, under the guise of a low tide and a porter seated on the quay. Again in the coach, and afterward in his chambers, he tried to swallow the laudanum; but his hand was paralyzed by "the convincing Spirit," aided by seasonable interruptions from the presence of his laundress and her husband, and at length he threw the laudanum away. On the night before the day appointed for the examination before the Lords, he lay some time with the point of his penknife pressed against his heart, but without courage to drive it home. Lastly, he tried to hang himself; and on this occasion he seems to have been saved not by the love of life, or by want of resolution, but by mere accident. He had become insensible, when the garter by which he was suspended broke, and his fall brought in the laundress, who supposed him to be in a fit. He sent her to a friend, to whom he related all that had passed.—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 1.

5428. SUICIDE, Philosophic. Marcus Porcius Cato. [Cæsar had defeated the army of Pompey and Cato near Utica.] The spirits of his party were not equal to his own, and some of his friends venturing to hint a wish for a timely capitulation, Cato counselled them to provide as they judged best for their own safety. After supper, during which he conversed with his usual cheerfulness, he retired to his apartment, and for a while occupied himself in perusing Plato's "Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul." He then composed himself to sleep, and after a short repose, inquiring whether his friends had saved themselves by flight, and being assured that all was well, he calmly fell upon his sword.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2, p. 412.

5429. SUICIDE, Remorseful. Shelley's first Wife. The life that once was dearest to him had ended thus in misery, desertion, want. The mother of his two children, abandoned by both her husband and her lover, and driven from her father's home, had drowned herself after a brief struggle with circumstance. However Shelley may have felt that his conscience was free from blame, however small an element of self-reproach may have mingled with his grief and horror, there is no doubt that he suffered most acutely. His deepest ground for remorse seems to have been the conviction that he had drawn Harriet into a sphere of thought and feeling for which she was not qualified, and that had it not been for him and his opinions, she might have lived a happy woman in some common walk of life. One of his biographers asserts that "he continued to be haunted by certain recollections, partly real and partly imaginative, which pursued him like an Orestes."—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 4.

5430. SUMMER, Land of. North Carolina. In spite of Locke's grand model and the Tuscarora war, in spite of the threatened Spanish invasion of 1744, the northern colony had greatly prospered. The intellectual development of the people had not been as rapid as the growth in numbers and in wealth. Little attention had been given to questions of religion. There was no minister in the province until 1703. Two years later the first church was built. The first court-house was erected in 1722, and the printing-press did not begin its work until 1754. But the people were brave and patriotic. They loved their country, and called it the "Land of Summer." In the farm-house and the village, along the banks of the rivers and the borders of the primeval forests, the spirit of liberty pervaded every breast. The love of freedom was intense, and hostility to tyranny a universal passion. In the times of Sothel it was said of the North Carolinians that they would not pay tribute even to Cæsar.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 27, p. 229.

5431. SUMMONS, Exasperating. The Black Prince. The success of Henry of Trastamara decided him to take immediate action, and in 1369 he summoned the Black Prince, as Duke of Aquitaine, to meet the appeal of the Gascon lords in his court. The prince was maddened by the summons. "I will come," he replied, "but with helmet on head, and with sixty thousand men at my back."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, §353.

5432. SUN, Worship of the. Persians. The Persians of every age have denied the charge, and explained the equivocal conduct, which might appear to give a color to it. The elements, and more particularly fire, light, and the sun, whom they called Mithra, were the objects of their religious reverence, because they considered them as the purest symbols, the noblest productions, and the most powerful agents of the Divine power and nature.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 8, p. 233.

5433. SUNDAY, Burdensome. Samuel Johnson. It was a heavy day with me when I was a boy. My mother confined me on that day, and made me read "The Whole Duty of Man," from a great part of which I could derive no instruction. When, for instance, I had read the chapter on theft, which, from my infancy, I had been taught was wrong, I was no more convinced that theft was wrong than before; so there was no accession of knowledge.—BOSWELL'S JOHN-SON, p. 13.

5434. SUNDAY-SCHOOLS, Farmers'. John Bunyan. If religion was not taught at school, it was taught with some care in the cottages and farm-houses by parents and masters. It was common in many parts of England, as late as the end of the last century, for the farmers to gather their apprentices about them on Sunday afternoons, and to teach them the Catechism. Rude as was Bunyan's home, religious notions of some kind had been early and vividly impressed upon him.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 1.

5435. SUNDAY-SCHOOLS, Fruit. England. In 1816 . . . a new order of politicians was called into action. "The Sunday-schools of the preceding thirty years had produced many working men of sufficient talent to become readers, writers, and speakers in the village meetings for Parliamentary Reform. . . . By such various means, anxious listeners at first, and then zealous proselytes, were drawn from the cottages of quiet nooks and dingles, to the weekly readings and discussions of the Hampden clubs."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 5, p. 73.

5436. SUPERSTITION, Absurdity of. Papal. [Pope] Alexander VI. . . . and his favorite son, Cæsar Borgia, continued to practise every effort of ambitious villainy to increase their power and accumulate wealth. The personal estate of the cardinals on their death devolved to the pope, and many an unhappy cardinal died suddenly during this pontificate. Borgia, by force of arms, made himself master of the territories of some of the richest of the Italian nobles. Four of them he invited to a friendly conference, under the most solemn protestations of amicable intentions, and he massacred two of them by ambuscade. Vitelli, one of these wretched victims, is said to have entreated Borgia, his murderer, to ask of the pope, his father, a plenary indulgence for him in the agonies of death. Such is the deplorable weakness of superstition, that can attribute to the most abandoned of men the power of pardoning all offences against the Deity.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 221.

5437. SUPERSTITION, Aid of. Charles VII. [He was opposed by the Duke of Burgundy, one of the most powerful princes in Europe. When he recovered his father's throne] the kingdom was nearly exhausted by war. . . . In this distressed situation of France, Charles, availing himself of the superstition of the age, projected an extraordinary scheme for the recovery of his kingdom, by feigning an interposition from Heaven in his favor. A gentleman, of the name of Baudricourt, saw a young servant maid at an inn in Lorraine, whom he immediately conceived to be a fit person for playing a very extraordinary part. She was taught her cue, and made to counterfeit a divine inspiration. They carried her before the king, where the answers that were put in her mouth and the demeanor which she assumed convinced everybody that she was inspired. Orleans was, at this time, besieged by the English. Joan of Arc, this heroic maid, who had now assumed the dress of a man, undertook to relieve the town and compel the English to abandon the enterprise. She put herself at the head of the French troops, attacked, beat, and dispersed the English, who believed her to be the devil himself, delivered Orleans, and placed the crown upon Charles' head in the church of Rheims. She proceeded for some time in this career of success, till she was at last taken prisoner at Compiègne. The regent Bedford, either in a fit of passion, or to satisfy the revenge of the English, instead of respecting, as he ought to have done, this singular instance of intrepidity in one of her sex, was prompted to behave with meanness and cruelty. She was tried as a heretic and sorceress by an ecclesiastical tribunal, and condemned and burnt at Rouen.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 18, p. 206.

5438. ——. Athenians. A considerable party of the citizens, however, were secretly hostile to the usurpation of Pisistratus. The faction of the Alcæmonidae, of whom the chiefs were Megacles and Lycurgus, gained at length so much strength as to attack and expel the usurper from the city. The stratagem by which he regained his power is a singular instance of the force of superstition. He procured a beautiful female to personate the goddess of Minerva. Seated on a lofty chariot, she drove into the city, while her attendants proclaimed aloud that their tutelary deity had deigned in person to visit them, and to demand the restoration of her favorite Pisistratus. A general acclamation hailed the auspicious presence, and all paid obedience to the heavenly summons.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10, p. 110.

5439. SUPERSTITION, Alarm of. Europe. The summer which followed the close of the American war is described as "an amazing and portentous one." There were alarming meteors and tremendous thunder-storms. For many weeks of June, July, and August the sun was clouded over with a smoky fog that proceeded from whatever quarter the wind blew. At noon it cast "a rust-colored, ferruginous light;" at rising and setting it was "lurid and blood-colored." The phenomena prevailed over the whole of Europe. The people looked with superstitious awe on the "disastrous twilight."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 1, p. 1.

5440. SUPERSTITION, Appeal to. Roman Emperor Constantius. [Ambassadors from the usurper Magnentius asking alliance.] Such propositions and such arguments appeared to deserve the most serious attention; the answer of Constantius was deferred till the next day; and as he had reflected on the importance of justifying a civil war in the opinion of the people, he thus addressed his council, who listened with real or affected credulity: "Last night," said he, "after I retired to rest, the shade of the great Constantine, embracing the corpse of my murdered brother, rose before my eyes; his well-known voice awakened me to revenge, forbade me to despair of the republic, and assured me of the success and immortal glory which would crown the justice of my arms."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 18, p. 190.

5441. ——. John Smith. He fought like a lion at bay, tied one of his guides to his left arm for a buckler, ran and fired by turns, stumbled into a morass, and was finally overtaken. The savages were still wary of their dangerous antagonist until he laid down his gun, made signs of surrender, and was pulled out of the mire. Without exhibiting the least signs of fear, Smith demanded to see the Indian chief, and on being taken into the presence of that dignitary, began to excite his interest and curiosity by showing him a pocket compass and a watch. These mysterious instruments struck the Indians with awe; and profiting by the momentary advantage, the prisoner began to draw figures on the ground, and to give his captors some rude lessons in geography and astronomy. The savages were amazed, and listened for an hour, but then grew tired, bound their captive to a tree, and prepared to shoot him. At the critical moment he flourished his compass in the air, as though performing a ceremony, and the Indians forbore to shoot. His sagacity and courage had gained the day, but the more appalling danger of torture was yet to be avoided. The savages, however, were thoroughly superstitious, and became afraid to proceed against him, except in the most formal manner. He was regarded by them as an inhabitant of another world, whom it was dangerous to touch.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 9, p. 99.

5442. SUPERSTITION—ASTROLOGY. Charles II. [In 1647 Charles II., when about to flee his kingdom, consulted by a female agent an astrologer to ascertain where he should seek refuge.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 5, p. 82.

5443. SUPERSTITION, Beneficial. Pestilence. The priests, to put a stop to this calamity, which threatened to depopulate the city, tried every expedient which policy or superstition could devise. A Lectisternium was celebrated, and scenic representations were for the first time introduced at Rome, borrowed, it is said, from Etruria. But all was to no purpose. The plague, however, is recorded to have yielded at last to the ceremony of driving a nail into the temple of Jupiter. This, a French writer remarks, was curing one contagious disease by another yet more contagious; meaning, no doubt, that the encouragement of superstition is worse than the pestilence—a sentiment which is not happily applied to the case of a rude people, whose superstitious prejudices are the safeguard of their morals, and will be cherished by a wise legislator as an engine of good policy.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 6, p. 351.

5444. SUPERSTITION, Common. England. A.D. 1642. All men had a touch of superstition. Evelyn looks with wonder upon "a shining cloud in the air, in shape resembling a sword." After the battle of Edgehill, "in the very place where the battle was stricken, have since and doth appear strange and portentous apparitions of two jarring and contrary armies." So records a tract in which the apparitions and prodigious noises of war and battles are certified by a justice of the peace, a preacher, and other persons of quality.—KNIGHT'S ENG., ch. 3, § 30, p. 494.

5445. SUPERSTITION, Controlled by. West Indians. [Columbus was shipwrecked on his third voyage, aged, sick, and famishing.] They withheld all provisions, in hopes either of starving the admiral and his people, or of driving them from the island. In this extremity a fortunate idea presented itself to Columbus. From his knowledge of astronomy, he ascertained that, within three days, there would be a total eclipse of the moon in the early part of the night. He sent, therefore, an Indian of Hispaniola, who served as his interpreter, to summon the principal caciques to a grand conference, appointing for it the day of the eclipse. When all were assembled, he told them by his interpreter that he and his followers were worshippers of a Deity who dwelt in the skies, who favored such as did well. This great Deity, he added, was incensed against the Indians who refused to furnish his faithful worshippers with provisions, and intended to chastise them with famine and pestilence. Lest they should disbelieve this warning, a signal would be given that night. They would behold the moon change its color and gradually lose its light—a token of the fearful punishment which awaited them.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 16, ch. 3.

5446. SUPERSTITION, Cowardice of. Mexicans. Scarce had Cortez appeared upon the frontier, when a sudden consternation seized the whole empire, and paved the way for an easy conquest. The ships, the arms, the dress of the Spaniards, made the Americans regard them at first as beings of a superior nature. When Cortez arrived at the city of Mexico, he was received by the prince, Montezuma, with every mark of reverence and submission.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 21, p. 309.

5447. SUPERSTITION, Credulity of. Zerah Coleburn. [The wonderful mathematician. See No. 3532.] Some people thought him a conjurer. A woman came to him one day, saying that twenty years ago she had had some spoons stolen, and asked him where they were. One good lady said that, in her opinion, God had endowed the child with a miraculous gift in order that he might explain the mysterious numbers of the prophecies. Some people manifested a certain degree of terror in his presence, as though he were possessed of the devil. What added to the marvel was, that the boy was totally unable to explain the processes by which he effected his calculations. . . . "God put it into my head," he said, one day, to an inquisitive lady, "but I cannot put it into yours."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 81.

5448. — — — American Indian. The medicine man boasts of his power over the elements; he can call water from above, beneath, and around; he can foretell a drought, or bring rain, or guide the lightning; . . . he conjures the fish; . . . he can pronounce spells . . . which will compel the beaver to rise up from beneath the water; . . . he can . . . draw the heart of a woman. . . . If an evil spirit has introduced disease, . . . the medicine man can put it to flight.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

5449. SUPERSTITION, Depressed by. Alexander. The Chaldean priests of Babylon had appropriated to their own use the riches and revenue of the temple of Belus, which was the ornament of that city, and a great object of superstitious veneration. Alexander had expressed a purpose of reforming this abuse, and the Chaldeans, to avert his design, had published a prediction that his entry into Babylon would be fatal to the conqueror of the East. Alexander probably saw through this artifice, and despised it. He entered Babylon in triumph, and was so delighted with the splendor of that great city, that he declared his purpose of making it the capital of his empire. He there received ambassadors from various regions of the earth, congratulating him on his conquests, and soliciting his friendship and alliance; but mark the force of superstition even in the greatest minds. The Chaldean prophecy, in spite of reason, depressed his spirits to such a degree as to force him to drown reflection by every species of riot and debauchery. The consequence was an inflammatory fever, which, after a few days' continuance, put an end to his life, in the thirty-third year of his age.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 4, p. 193.

5450. SUPERSTITION from Ignorance. Ancient Germans. The same ignorance which renders barbarians incapable of conceiving or embracing the useful restraints of laws, exposes them naked and unarmed to the blind terrors of superstition. The German priests, improving this favorable temper of their countrymen, had assumed a jurisdiction, even in temporal concerns, which the magistrate could not venture to exercise; and the haughty warrior patiently submitted to the lash of correction when it was inflicted, not by any human power, but by the immediate order of the god of war.—GIBBON'S ROMÉ, ch. 9, p. 270.

5451. SUPERSTITION, Incredible. First Crusade. Above eighty thousand ranged themselves under the banner of Peter the Hermit, who walked at their head with a rope about his waist, and sandals on his feet. Peter's lieutenant was Walter the Pennyless, and in the van of his troops were carried a sacred goose and a goat, which, (monstrous to believe!) were said to be filled with the Holy Ghost. This immense and disorderly multitude began their march toward the East in the year 1095. They made the first essay of their arms, not upon the unbelievers, but on their fellow-Christians. The first exploit which signalized the expedition was the taking of a small Christian city in Hungary, which had refused to starve its own inhabitants by supplying such a tribe of hungry locusts with provisions. This impious city was stormed and pillaged, and the inhabitants massacred.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 9, p. 154.

5452. SUPERSTITION, Inhumanity of. Sylla. Sylla gave the people a magnificent entertainment, on account of his dedicating the tenth of his substance to Hercules. The provisions were so overabundant, that a great quantity was thrown every day into the river; and the wine that was drank was forty years old at least. In the midst of this feasting, which lasted many days, Metella sickened and died. As the priests forbade him to approach her, and to have his house defiled with mourning, he sent her a bill of divorce, and ordered her to be carried to another house while the breath was in her body. His superstition made him very punctilious in observing these laws of the priests.—PLUTARCH'S SYLLA.

5453. SUPERSTITION, Inventions of. King Philip's War. The minds of the English were appalled by the horrors of the impending conflict, and superstition indulged in its wild inventions. At the time of the eclipse of the moon you might have seen the figure of an Indian scalp imprinted on the centre of the disk. The perfect form of an Indian bow appeared in the sky. The sighing of the wind was like the whistling of bullets. Some distinctly heard invisible troops of horses gallop through the air; while others found the prophecy of calamities in the howling of the wolves.—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 12.

5454. SUPERSTITION, Omens of. Meteor. On the 12th of December, 1680, John Evelyn writes: "This evening, looking out of my chamber window toward the west, I saw a meteor of an obscure bright color, very much in shape like the blade of a sword, the rest of the sky being very serene and clear. What this may portend God only knows. But such another phenomena I remember to have seen in 1640, about the trial of the great Earl of Strafford preceding our bloody revolution."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 22, p. 360.

5455. SUPERSTITION, Religious. Cures. A notable instance of superstitious frenzy was that connected with an ecclesiastic named Paris, who, having fallen a victim, at an early age, to the excess of his ascetic rigor, was venerated after death as a saint by devout crowds who came to pray at his tomb. . . . Soon it began to be rumored that miracles had been wrought by his remains; instantaneous cures were effected; the lame, the impotent, the paralytic, seized with convulsive spasms, and raised to a state of preternatural ecstasy, suddenly recovered the use of their limbs; various nervous diseases disappeared under the same influence; it was even pretended that obstinate wounds and cancerous ulcers had been healed. These strange phenomena increased to such an extent that the Archbishop of Paris published a brief in which he attributed them to the agency of Satan.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 22, § 5.

5456. SUPERSTITION removed. At Alexandria. A great number of plates of different metals, artificially joined together, composed the majestic figure of the deity, who touched on either side the walls of the sanctuary. The aspect of Serapis, his sitting posture, and the sceptre which he bore in his left hand were extremely similar to the ordinary representations of Jupiter. It was confidently reported that if any impious hand should dare to violate the majesty of the god, the heavens and the earth would instantly return to their original chaos. An intrepid soldier, animated by zeal, and armed with a weighty battle-axe, ascended the ladder; and even the Christian multitude expected with some anxiety the event of the combat. He aimed a vigorous stroke against the cheek of Serapis; the cheek fell to the ground; the thunder was still silent, and both the heavens and the earth continued to preserve their accustomed order and tranquillity. The victorious soldier repeated his blows; the huge idol was overthrown and broken in pieces, and the limbs of Serapis were ignominiously dragged through the streets of Alexandria. His mangled carcass was burnt in the amphitheatre, amid the shouts of the populace; and many persons attributed their conversion to this discovery of the impotence of the tutelar deity.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 4, p. 10.

5457. SUPERSTITION, Ridiculous. Egyptians. The superstitions of the Egyptians were a copious subject of ridicule to other nations of antiquity, and contributed to degrade them in the opinion of those whose objects of religious worship, if not fundamentally more rational, were less ludicrous, less childish and unmanly. What could they think of a nation where, as Herodotus tells us, if a house was on fire, the father of a family would take more pains to save his cats than his wife and children; where a mother would be transported with joy at the news of her child being devoured by a crocodile; or where the soldiers, returning from a military expedition, would come home loaded with a precious booty of dogs, cats, hawks, and vultures? —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 47.

5458. SUPERSTITION, Safety by. Captain John Smith. [In 1608 John Smith was preserved by the Indians who had butchered his companions. He exhibited a pocket compass, and showed how it always pointed to one quarter. See No. 5441.] He requested that a letter should be conveyed to Jamestown; and when it was known that he could so endure a piece of paper with intelligence as to speak to his distant companions, he was beheld with superstitious awe.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 22, p. 344.

5459. SUPERSTITION of Scholars. A.D. 1653. [The learned and the scientific were not free from it.] Mr. [William] Oughtred, a renowned mathematician, . . . had strong apprehensions of some extraordinary event to happen the following year, from the calculation of coincidence with the diluvian period; and added that it might possibly be to convert the Jews by our Saviour's visible appearance, and to judge the world. The almanac-makers of that time were deluding the people with those prophecies, which they continued to swallow for two centuries. . . . On the 29th of April, 1653, the people were terribly frightened by an eclipse of the sun. This day was called Mirk Monday, and the dread of it so exceedingly alarmed the whole nation, that hardly any one would work or stir out of their houses.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 11, p. 175.

5460. SUPERSTITION of Soldiers. Spirits. [The Earl of Surrey writes from Scotland in 1523:] About eight o'clock the horses of his company suddenly brake loose and suddenly run out of his field in such numbers that it caused a marvellous alarm in our field; and our standing watch being set, the horses came running along the camp, at whom were shot above one hundred sheaves of arrows and divers guns, thinking that they would have been Scots that would have assaulted the camp. Finally the horses were so mad that they ran like wild deer into the field, above fifteen hundred at least in divers companies, and in one place above fifty ran down a great rock and slew themselves; and above two hundred and fifty ran into the town, being on fire, and by the women taken and carried away, right evil brent; and many were taken again, and finally by what I can esteem by the number of them that I saw go on foot the next day, I think there is lost above eight hundred horses, and all with folly for lack of not lying within the camp. I dare not write the wonders that my Lord Dacre and all his company do say they saw that night, six times, of spirits and fearful sights. And universally all their company say plainly the devil was that night among them six times, which misfortune hath blemished the best journey that was made in Scotland many years.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 18, p. 299.

5461. SUPERSTITION vs. Wisdom. Julian. In fact, Julian was, as a pagan, blinded by the most bigoted superstition. His belief in omens was ridiculous; his sacrifices were so numerous that cattle were wanting to supply him with victims. The expense of these religious rites became burdensome to the State, and was universally complained of. He was even accused of the horrid abomination of human sacrifices. His enthusiasm and fanaticism, acknowledged even by his greatest panegyrists, "almost degrade him to the level of an Egyptian monk." "Notwithstanding his own modest silence upon the subject," says Mr. Gibbon, "we may learn from his faithful friend, the orator Libanius, that he lived in a perpetual intercourse with the gods and goddesses; that they descended upon earth to enjoy the conversation of their favorite hero; that they gently interrupted his slumbers by touching his hand or his hair; that they warned him of any impending danger, and conducted him by their infallible wisdom in every action of his life; and that he had acquired such an intimate knowledge of his heavenly guests, as readily to distinguish the voice of Jupiter from that of Minerva, and the form of Apollo from the figure of Hercules." In short, this wise and philosophic emperor was, in matters of religion, one of the weakest, most bigoted, and superstitious of mankind.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 3, p. 519.

5462. SUPPLIANT, An abject. Reign of James II. [Rochester, the lord-treasurer, was a Protestant whom the king proposed to dismiss from office.] "It is whispered," he said, "that if I do not as your Majesty would have me, I shall not be suffered to continue in my present station." The king said, with some general expressions of kindness, that it was difficult to prevent people from talking, and that loose reports were not to be regarded. These vague phrases were not likely to quiet the perturbed mind of the minister. His agitation became violent, and he began to plead for his place as if he had been pleading for his life. "Your Majesty sees that I do all in my power to obey you. Indeed, I will do all that I can to obey you in everything. I will serve you in your own way. Nay," he cried, in an agony of baseness, "I will do what I can to believe as you would have me. But do not let me be told, while I am trying to bring my mind to this, that if I find it impossible to comply, I must lose all."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 142.

5463. SUPREMACY, Meritorious. Late in Seventeenth Century. France united at that time almost every species of ascendancy. Her military glory was at the height. She had vanquished mighty coalitions. She had dictated treaties. She had subjugated great cities and provinces. She had forced the Castilian pride to yield her the precedence. She had summoned Italian princes to prostrate themselves at her footstool. Her authority was supreme in all matters of good breeding, from a duel to a minuet. She determined how a gentleman's coat must be cut, how long his peruke must be, whether his heels must be high or low, and whether the lace on his hat must be broad or narrow. In literature she gave law to the world. The fame of her great writers filled Europe.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 369.

5464. SURGERY, Brave. Duke Leopold. [The Austrian crusader.] Leopold had stuff in him too. He died, for example, in this manner: falling with his horse, I think in some siege or other, he had got his leg hurt, which hindered him in fighting. Leg could not be cured: "Cut it off, then!" said Leopold. This also the leech could not do, durst not, and would not, so that Leopold was come quite to a halt. Leopold ordered out two squires, put his thigh upon a block, the sharp edge of an axe at the right point across his thigh: "Squire first, hold that axe; steady! Squire second, smite you on it with forge-hammer, with all your strength, heavy enough!" Squire second struck heavy enough, and the leg flew off; but Leopold took inflammation, died in a day or two, as the leech had predicted.—CARLYLE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, Book 2, ch. 6, p. 88.

5465. SURGERY, Skill in. Dr. Valentine Mott. In 1828 he performed what is universally allowed to be the most difficult feat ever attempted in surgery. A clergyman was afflicted with an enormous tumor in the neck, in which were embedded and twisted many of the great arteries. In removing this tumor, it was necessary to take out entire one of the collar-bones, to lay bare the membrane enclosing the lungs, to dissect around arteries displaced by the tumor and embedded in it, to apply forty ligatures, and remove an immense mass of diseased matter. All this was done without the aid of chloroform. The patient survived the operation, and is now living and discharging the duties of his profession. Dr. Mott was the first to operate successfully for immovability of the lower jaw, and the first to entirely remove the lower jaw. He was the first to succeed in sewing up a slit in a large vein.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 530.

5466. SURPRISE, Mutual. American Revolution. After the fall of Charleston General Gates was appointed to command in the South. [He took post at Clermont, thirteen miles from Camden, where the British forces were concentrated.] By a singular coincidence Cornwallis and Gates each formed the design of surprising his antagonist in the night. Accordingly, on the evening of the 15th of August, Gates set out for Camden, and at the same time Cornwallis moved toward Clermont. About daydawn the two armies met midway on Sander's Creek.

Both generals were surprised, but both made immediate preparations for battle. [The Americans were badly defeated.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 43, p. 341.

5467. SURPRISE, Success by. Colonel Barton. On the 10th of July a brilliant exploit was performed in Rhode Island. Colonel William Barton, of Providence, learning that Major-General Prescott was quartered at a farm-house near Newport, apart from his division, determined to capture him. On the night of the 10th of July the daring colonel, with forty volunteers, embarked at Providence, dropped down the bay, and reached the island near Prescott's lodgings. The movement was not discovered. The British sentinel was deceived with a plausible statement, and then threatened with death if he did not remain quiet. The patriots rushed forward, burst open Prescott's door, seized him in bed, and hurried him half clad to the boats. The alarm was raised; a squad came hurrying to the water's edge; but the provincials were already paddling out of sight with their prisoner. This lucky exploit gave the Americans an officer of equal rank to exchange for General Lee. Colonel Barton was rewarded with promotion and an elegant sword.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 40, p. 320.

5468. SURRENDER to Death. Boges. Boges was governor of it [Eion] under the King of Persia, and acted with such a zeal and fidelity for his sovereign as have few examples. When besieged by Cimon and the Athenians, it was in his power to have capitulated upon honorable terms, and to have returned to Asia with his family and all his effects. However, being persuaded he could not do this with honor, he resolved to die rather than surrender. The city was assaulted with the utmost fury, and he defended it with incredible bravery. Being at last in the utmost want of provisions, he threw from the walls into the river Strymon all the gold and silver in the place; then caused fire to be set to a pile, and having killed his wife, his children, and his whole family, he threw them into the midst of the flames, and afterward rushed into them himself.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 7, § 3.

5469. SURRENDER demanded. Ethan Allen. This daring and eccentric man was chosen colonel by a company of two hundred and seventy patriots. To capture Ticonderoga, with its vast magazine of stores, was the object of Allen and the audacious mountaineers of whom he was the leader. Benedict Arnold left Cambridge, and joined the expedition as a private. On the evening of the 9th of May . . . they reached the eastern shore of Lake Champlain, opposite Ticonderoga. Only a few boats could be procured, and when day broke on the following morning but eighty-three men had succeeded in crossing. With this mere handful—for the rest could not be waited for—Allen, with Arnold by his side, made a dash, and gained the gateway of the fort. The sentinel was driven in, closely followed by the mountaineers, who set up such a shout as few garrisons had ever heard. Allen's men hastily faced the barracks, and stood ready to fire; he himself rushed to the quarters of Delaplace, the commandant, and shouted for the incumbent to get up. The startled official thrust out his head. "Surrender this fort instantly," said Allen. "By what authority?" inquired the astounded officer. "In the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress!" said Allen, flourishing his sword. Delaplace had no alternative. The garrison, numbering forty-eight, were made prisoners and sent to Connecticut. A fortress which had cost Great Britain eight million pounds sterling was captured in ten minutes by a company of undisciplined provincials. . . . A hundred and twenty cannon and vast quantities of military stores fell into the hands of the Americans.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 38, p. 298.

5470. SURRENDER, Disgraceful. Manchester. [When Charles Edward, grandson of James II., was endeavoring to recover the throne, his Highlanders were near to Manchester, into which preceded them a sergeant, his mistress, and his drummer, and the town yielded.] "Manchester," says volunteer Ray, "was taken by a sergeant, a drum, and a woman, about two o'clock in the afternoon."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 9, p. 145.

5471. SURRENDER, Final. Civil War. On the 7th of April [1865] . . . General Grant, now at Farmville, addressed a note to the Confederate commander, expressing a desire that the further effusion of blood might be saved by the surrender of the Confederate army. To this General Lee replied by declaring his desire for peace, but adding that the occasion for the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia had not arrived. On the morning of the 9th, however, when it became known that the left wing of the Union army had secured the line of the Lynchburg Railroad, when the wreck of Longstreet's veterans, attempting to continue the retreat, were confronted and driven back by Sheridan, then the iron-souled Confederate leader, seeing the utter uselessness of a further struggle, sent General Grant a note, asking for a meeting preliminary to a surrender. The Union commander immediately complied with the request. At two o'clock in the afternoon of Palm Sunday, the 9th of April, 1865, the two great generals met each other in the parlor of William McLean at Appomattox Court-House. There the terms of surrender were discussed and settled. It was agreed that General Grant should put his proposition in the form of a military note [which he did]. To this . . . General Lee responded as follows: "Head Quarters Army of Northern Virginia, April 9th, 1865. General: I received your letter of this date, containing the terms of the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia, as proposed by you. As they are substantially the same as those expressed in your letter of the 8th instant, they are accepted. I will proceed to designate the proper officers to carry the stipulation into effect.—R. E. Lee, General." Thus the work was done. . . . After four dreadful years of bloodshed, devastation, and sorrow, the civil war in the United States was at an end.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 66, p. 539.

5472. SURRENDER, Impossible to. "The Old Guard." [When the remnant of the French army was retreating from Waterloo, two battalions covered the retreat against the re-enforced and victorious allies.] Weary of the butchery, they suspended for a moment their fire, and sent a flag of truce demanding a capitulation. General Cambronne returned the immortal reply, "The Guard dies; it never surrenders." [Soon they] mowed them all down—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 27.

5473. SURRENDER, Indignant. Peter Stuyvesant. [On the 28th of August, 1664, the English demanded the surrender of New Netherland and an immediate acknowledgment of the sovereignty of England.] It was clear that the burghmasters meant to surrender. The stormy old governor exhorted them to rouse to action and fight; some one replied that the Dutch West India company was not worth fighting for. Burning with indignation, Stuyvesant snatched up the written proposal of Nicolls and tore it to tatters in the presence of his council. It was all in vain. The brave old man was forced to sign the capitulation; and on the 8th of September, 1664, New Netherland ceased to exist. The English flag was hoisted over the fort and town, and the name of New York was substituted for New Amsterdam.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 19, p. 171.

5474. SURRENDER prevented. Charter Oak. Attended by an armed guard, Andros proceeded to Connecticut. Arriving at Hartford in October of 1687, he found the assembly of the province in session, and demanded the surrender of the colonial charter. The instrument was brought in and laid upon the table. A spirited debate ensued, and lasted until evening. When it was about to be decided that the charter should be given up, the lamps were suddenly dashed out. Other lights were brought in, but the charter had disappeared. Joseph Wadsworth, snatching up the precious parchment, bore it off through the darkness, and concealed it in a hollow tree, ever afterward remembered with affection as The Charter Oak. But the assembly was overawed and the free government of Connecticut subverted.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 15, p. 146.

5475. SUSPENSION, Financial. Bank of England. [In 1797, after a continued run on the bank for specie in exchange for its notes, it was compelled to pay in sixpences, and then, by command of George III., to suspend specie payments. The next day] there was a great meeting of merchants at the Mansion House, when a unanimous resolution passed, that "we will not refuse to receive bank-notes in payment of any sum of money to be paid to us, and will use our utmost endeavor to make all our payments in a similar manner." The stocks immediately rose. A weight was suddenly taken off the wheels of industry. . . . But a chronic malady was induced which lasted during a generation—a malady which defied every attempt to cure till the principle of a convertible paper currency was again firmly established. Of the lasting effects of this measure, which was only intended to be temporary, the government of 1797 could have no conception. [Specie payments were resumed in 1823.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 19, p. 334.

5476. SUSPICION, Above. Cæsar's Wife. [See No. 1652.] Clodius was not yet the dangerous desperado which he afterward became; and immorality, though seasoned with impiety, might easily, it was thought, be made too much of. Cæsar himself did not press for punishment. As president of the college, he had acquiesced in their decision, and he divorced the unfortunate Pompeia; but he expressed no opinion as to the extent of her criminality, and he gave as his reason for separating from her, not that she was guilty, but that Cæsar's wife must be above suspicion.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12.

5477. SUSPICION, Clamorous. Free Masons. William Morgan, a resident of western New York, having threatened to publish the secrets of the Masonic fraternity, of which he was a member, suddenly disappeared from home, and was never heard of afterward. The Masons fell under the suspicion of having abducted and murdered him. A great clamor was raised against them in New York, and the excitement extended to other parts of the country. The issues between the Masons and their enemies became a political one, and many eminent men were embroiled in the controversy. For several years the anti-Masonic party exercised a considerable influence in the elections of the country. De Witt Clinton, one of the most prominent and valuable statesmen of New York, had to suffer much, in loss of reputation, from his membership in the order. His last days were clouded with the odium which for the time being attached to the Masonic name.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 53, p. 425.

5478. SUSPICION of Conspiracy. Constantine. An edict of Constantine, published about this time, manifestly indicates his real or affected suspicions that a secret conspiracy had been formed against his person and government. By all the allurements of honors and rewards, he invites informers of every degree to accuse without exception his magistrates or ministers, his friends or his most intimate favorites, protesting, with a solemn asseveration, that he himself will listen to the charge, that he himself will revenge his injuries; and concluding with a prayer, which discovers some apprehension of danger, that the providence of the Supreme Being may still continue to protect the safety of the emperor and of the empire.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 18, p. 159.

5479. SUSPICION diverted. Emperor Nero. Nero was so secure in his absolutism, he had hitherto found it so impossible to shock the feelings of the people or to exhaust the terrified adulation of the Senate, that he was usually indifferent to the pasquinades which were constantly holding up his name to execration and contempt. But now he felt that he had gone too far, and that his power would be seriously imperilled if he did not succeed in diverting the suspicions of the populace. He was perfectly aware that when the people in the streets cursed those who set fire to the city, they meant to curse him. If he did not take some immediate step he felt that he might perish, as Gaius had perished before him, by the dagger of the assassin. It is at this point of his career that Nero becomes a prominent figure in the history of the Church. . . . For Nero endeavored to fix the odious crime of having destroyed the capital of the world upon the most innocent and faithful of his subjects—upon the only subjects who offered heartfelt prayers on his behalf—the Roman Christians. They were the defenceless victims of this horrible charge; for though they were the most harmless, they were also the most hated and the most slandered of living men.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 4, p. 33.

5480. SUSPICION diverted. King of Portugal. [Each of the monarchs was preparing expeditions of discovery for the New World.] Resende, in his history of King John II., informs us that the Portuguese monarch, by large presents, or rather bribes, held certain of the confidential members of the Castilian cabinet in his interest, who informed him of the most secret councils of their court. The roads were thronged with couriers; scarce was an intention expressed by Ferdinand to his ministers, but it was conveyed to his rival monarch. The result was that the Spanish sovereigns seemed as if under the influence of some enchantment. King John anticipated all their movements, and appeared to dive into their very thoughts. . . . As a surmise of treachery in the cabinet might naturally arise, King John, while he rewarded his agents in secret, endeavored to divert suspicions from them upon others, making rich presents of jewels to the Duke de Infantado and other Spanish grandees of incorruptible integrity.—IRVING'S COOLUMBUS, Book 5, ch. 9.

5481. SUSPICION, Effect of. Reign of Commodus. That assembly, whom Marcus had ever considered as the great council of the nation, was composed of the most distinguished of the Romans; and distinction of every kind soon became criminal. The possession of wealth stimulated the diligence of the informers; rigid virtue implied a tacit censure of the irregularities of Commodus; important services implied a dangerous superiority of merit; and the friendship of the father always insured the aversion of the son. Suspicion was equivalent to proof; trial to condemnation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 105.

5482. SUSPICION, Perilous. Emperor Nero. A conspiracy, which was at this time discovered, gave Nero ample scope for the gratification of the natural cruelty of his disposition. The slightest suspicion of guilt was now punished with immediate death. It was a sufficient crime if a man was seen to have saluted a suspected person. Seneca, among others, was accused of having been privy to this conspiracy; and as a mark of the emperor's gratitude for the past services of his preceptor, he was permitted to choose the manner of his death. He chose to expire in a warm bath, after having his veins opened.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 488.

5483. SUSPICION sown. In War. As Themistocles sailed along the coasts, wherever he saw any harbors or places proper for the enemy's ships to put in at, he took such stones as he happened to find, or caused to be brought thither for that purpose, and set them up in the ports and watering-places, with the following inscription engraved in large characters, and addressed to the Ionians. "Let the Ionians, if it be possible, come over to the Greeks, from whom they are descended, and who now risk their lives for their liberty. If this be impracticable, let them at least perplex the barbarians, and put them in disorder in time of action." By this he hoped either to bring the Ionians over to his side, or to sow discord among them by causing them to be suspected by the Persians.—PLUTARCH'S THEMISTOCLES.

5484. SUSPICION, Weakness of. Dionysius. [Dionysius the tyrant] was so suspicious of all mankind, and so wretchedly timorous, that he would not suffer a barber to shave him, but had his hair singed off with a live coal by one of his own attendants. Neither his brother nor his son were admitted into his chamber in their own clothes, but were first stripped and examined by the sentinels, and after that were obliged to put on such clothes as were provided for them. When his brother Leptines was once describing the situation of a place, he took a spear from one of the guards to trace the plan, upon which Dionysius was extremely offended, and caused the soldier who had given up his spear to be put to death. He was afraid, he said, of the sense and sagacity of his friends, because he knew they must think it more eligible to govern than to obey. He slew Marsyas, whom he had advanced to a considerable military command, merely because Marsyas dreamed that he killed him; for he concluded that this dream by night was occasioned by some similar suggestion of the day. Yet even this timorous and suspicious wretch was offended with Plato, because he would not allow him to be the most valiant man in the world!—PLUTARCH.

5485. SWEARING, Admired. General Charles Scott. [He] had a most inveterate habit of swearing; whether in private or public, . . . every other word was an oath. . . . After the war a friend, . . . anxious to reform his evil habits, asked him whether it was possible that . . . the admired Washington ever swore. Scott reflected for a moment, and then exclaimed: "Yes, once. It was at Monmouth, and on a day that would have made any man swear. Yes, sir, he swore on that day till the leaves shook on the trees—charming, delightful. Never have I enjoyed such swearing before or since. Sir, on that ever-memorable day he swore like an angel from heaven." The reformer abandoned the general in despair.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 21.

5486. SWEARING, Reproof for. John Bunyan. One day, as I was standing at a neighbor's shop-window, and there cursing and swearing after my wonted manner, there sat within the woman of the house and heard me, who, though she was a loose and ungodly wretch, protested that I swore and cursed at such a rate that she trembled to hear me. I was able to spoil all the youths in a whole town. At this reproof I was silenced and put to secret shame, and that too, as I thought, before the God of heaven. I stood hanging down my head, and wishing that I might be a little child, that my father might learn me to speak without this wicked sin of swearing; for, thought I, I am so accustomed to it that it is vain to think of a reformation.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 2.

5487. SWINDLER, A Royal. Henry VII. The ingrained covetousness and cunning of the man—for "of nature, assuredly, he coveted to accumulate treasure," and "neither did he care how cunning they were that he did employ, for he thought himself to have the master-reach." These qualities made him, to use plain words, a royal swindler. He went far beyond his age as an exaggerated representative of the new-born spirit of money-making, as opposed to the ancient spirit of violence. He carried it forward into that unscrupulous passion for wealth, which has rendered the grasping accumulator so detestable at all times.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 238.

5488. ——. Henry VIII. [Parliament in 1544 prepared Henry VIII. for the expense of wars with Scotland and with France, by declaring that all loans made to the king in the two previous years of his reign be entirely remitted and released, and securities for the same be utterly void.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 27, p. 442.

5489. ——. Richard I. [To raise money, he ordered the great seal to be broken, and proclamation to be made that no grant under that seal would be valid, unless the fees due to the crown were paid the second time for affixing the new seal.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22, p. 330.

5490. SWORD vs. Banner. Joan of Arc. She wore at her side a small battle-axe and the consecrated sword, marked on the blade with five crosses, which had at her bidding been taken for her from the shrine of St. Catharine at Fierbois. A page carried her banner, which she had caused to be made and embroidered as her Voices enjoined. It was white satin, strewn with fleurs-de-lis, and on it were the words "Jesus Maria," and the representation of the Saviour in His glory. Joan afterward generally bore her banner herself in battle; she said that though she loved her sword much, she loved her banner forty times as much; and she loved to carry it, because it could not kill any one.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 378.

5491. SWORD in Religion. Mahomet. "The sword," says Mahomet, "is the key of heaven and of hell; a drop of blood shed in the cause of God, a night spent in arms, is of more avail than two months of fasting or prayer; whosoever falls in battle, his sins are forgiven; at the day of judgment his wounds shall be resplendent as vermilion and odoriferous as musk; and the loss of his limbs shall be supplied by the wings of angels and cherubim."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 124.

5492. SWORD, Worship of the. Scythians. It is certain that the nomadic tribes of Northern Asia, whom Herodotus described under the name of Scythians, from the earliest times worshipped as their god a bare sword. That sword-god was supposed, in Attila's time, to have disappeared from earth; but the Hunnish king now claimed to have received it by special revelation. It was said that a herdsman, who was tracking in the desert a wounded heifer by the drops of blood, found the mysterious sword standing fixed in the ground, as if it had darted down from heaven. The herdsman bore it to Attila, who henceforth was believed by the Huns to wield the Spirit of Death in battle, and their seers prophesied that that sword was to destroy the world.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 235.

5493. SYMPATHY by Experience. Samuel Johnson. Johnson, whose robust frame was not in the least affected by the cold, scolded me, as if my shivering had been a paltry effeminacy, saying, "Why do you shiver?" Sir William Scott, of the Commons, told me that when he complained of a headache in the post-chaise, as they were travelling together to Scotland, Johnson treated him in the same manner: "At your age, sir, I had no headache." It is not easy to make allowance for sensations in others which we ourselves have not at the time. We must all have experienced how very differently we are affected by the complaints of our neighbors when we are well and when we are ill. In full health we can scarcely believe that they suffer much, so faint is the image of pain upon our imagination; when softened by sickness, we readily sympathize with the sufferings of others.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 128.

5494. SYMPATHY, Freaks of. Napoleon I. Napoleon could look with perfect composure upon the carnage of the field of battle, and order movements without the tremor of a nerve which he knew must consign thousands to a bloody death; but when [some one fell overboard] . . . his sympathies were aroused to the highest degree.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 10.

5495. SYMPATHY for the Friendless. Abraham Lincoln. Among the . . . persons in waiting . . . was a small, pale, delicate-looking boy about thirteen years old. The President saw him, . . . and said, "Come here, my boy, and tell me what you want." . . . With bowed head and timid accents, he said: "Mr. President, I have been a drummer-boy in a regiment for two years, and my colonel got angry with me and turned me off; I was taken sick, and have been a long time in hospital. This is the first time I have been out, and I came to see if you cannot do something for me." The President looked at him . . . tenderly, and asked him where he lived. "I have no home," answered the boy. "Where is your father?" "He died in the army," was the reply. "Where is your mother?" . . . "My mother is dead also. I have no mother, no father, no brothers, no sisters," and, bursting into tears, "no friends—nobody cares for me." Mr. Lincoln's eyes were filled with tears, and he said to him, "Can't you sell newspapers?" "No," said the boy; "I am too weak, and the surgeon of the hospital told me I must leave, and I have no money and no place to go to." The scene was wonderfully affecting. The President drew forth a card and . . . gave special directions "to care for this poor boy."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 740.

5496. SYMPATHY, Mutual. Napoleon I. [At St. Helena the captive emperor found] a poor negro slave working in Mr. Balcombe's garden, in whose history and welfare the emperor became deeply interested. He was a Malay Indian, of prepossessing appearance. He had been stolen from his native land by the crew of a British vessel. The emperor's sympathies were deeply moved by the old man's story. Poor Toby became very much attached to the emperor. . . . They were fellow-captives.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 30.

5497. SYMPATHY for the Poor. Abraham Lincoln. As a distinguished citizen of Ohio entered the vestibule of the White House, his attention was attracted by a poorly clad young woman who was violently sobbing. . . . She had been ordered away by the servants, after vainly endeavoring for many hours to see the President about her only brother, who had been condemned to death [for desertion]. . . . She had passed the long hours of two days trying in vain to get an audience. [He aided her admission to the office, and at his suggestion she forced her way between himself and Mr. Lincoln, and insisted on his examination of the papers she brought.] Mr. Lincoln was at first somewhat surprised at the apparent forwardness; . . . commenced an examination of the document; . . . his eye fell upon her scanty but neat dress. Instantly his face lighted up. "My poor girl," said he, "you have come here with no governor, or senator, or member of Congress to plead your cause. You seem honest and truthful, and you don't wear hoops; and I will be whipped but I will pardon your brother."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 739.

5498. SYMPATHY, Religious. Puritans of New England. The sympathies of the colonists were wide; a regard for Protestant Germany is as old as emigration; and during the Thirty Years' War the whole people of New England held fasts and offered prayers for the success of their Saxon brethren.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 10.

5499. SYMPATHY, Unmanned by. Columbus. [Moved by envy, and sustained by vilest slanders, Bobadilla sent him to Spain in irons. Great indignation and release followed.] When the queen beheld this venerable man approach, and thought on all he had deserved and all he had suffered, she was moved to tears. Columbus had borne up firmly against the rude conflicts of the world; he had endured with lofty scorn the injuries and insults of ignoble men; but he possessed strong and quick sensibility. When he found himself thus kindly received by his sovereigns, and beheld tears in the benign eyes of Isabella, his long-suppressed feelings burst forth; he threw himself on his knees, and for some time could not utter a word for the violence of his tears and sobbings.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 14, ch. 1.

5500. SYSTEM, Living by. Alfred the Great. Alfred was himself, for that age, a most accomplished scholar; and considering the necessary toils and constant active employment, it is surprising how much he employed himself in the pursuits of literature. He is said to have divided his time into three equal parts: one was allotted to the despatch of the business of government; another to diet, exercise, and sleep; and a third to study and devotion. By this admirable regularity of life he found means, notwithstanding his constant wars, and the care of entirely new modelling and civilizing his kingdom, to compose a variety of ingenious and learned works.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 5, p. 111.

5501. TACT, Lack of. President John Adams. The same qualities which made him a bad negotiator prevented his acquiring credit as the chief magistrate of the nation. He was a bad judge of men, and he was wedded to certain ancient and unpopular ideas which prevented his retaining the confidence of the masses. He was a kind of republican tory, at a time when the feeling of the nation was setting powerfully in the opposite direction. At the same time, his vanity, his quickness of temper, his total want of management, his blind trust in some men and his blind distrust of others, continually estranged from him those who would naturally have been his friends and supporters. After serving four years, he was whirled from his place by a tornado of democratic feeling.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 178.

5502. TACT, Natural. Henry Sidney. [He was the agent of the Prince of Orange in negotiating for the revolution with the peers of England.] Sidney, with a sweet temper and winning manners, seemed to be deficient in capacity and knowledge, and to be sunk in voluptuousness and indolence. His face and form were eminently handsome. In his youth he had been the terror of husbands; and even now, at near fifty, he was the favorite of women and the envy of younger men. He had formerly resided at the Hague in a public character, and had then succeeded in obtaining a large share of William's [Prince of Orange] confidence. Many wondered at this; for it seemed that between the most austere of statesmen and the most dissolute of idlers there could be nothing in common. . . . There is a certain tact, resembling an instinct, which is often wanting to great orators and philosophers, and which is often found in persons who, if judged by their conversation or by their writings, would be pronounced simpletons. Indeed, when a man possesses this tact, it is in some sense an advantage to him that he is destitute of those more showy talents which would make him an object of admiration, of envy, and of fear. Sidney was a remarkable instance of this truth. Incapable, ignorant, and dissipated as he seemed to be, he understood, or rather felt, with whom it was necessary to be reserved, and with whom he might safely venture to be communicative. The consequence was, that he did what Mordaunt, with all his vivacity and invention, or Burnet, with all his multifarious knowledge and fluent elocution, never could have done.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 373.

5503. TALENT without Character. Frederick the Great. By the public the King of Prussia was considered as a politician destitute alike of morality and decency, insatiably rapacious, and shamelessly false; nor was the public much in the wrong. He was at the same time allowed to be a man of parts—a rising general, a shrewd negotiator and administrator.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 42.

5504. TALENT, Discovery of. Napoleon I. He had ordered some very difficult and important works to be executed on a bridge of the canal of Languedoc. The engineer had admirably accomplished the arduous achievement. [Napoleon inspected the work, and asked many questions of the engineer.] The engineer seemed embarrassed, and replied with hesitation and confusion. Soon the prefect appeared. Napoleon promptly said to him: "I am not correctly informed. The bridge was not made by that man. Such a work is beyond his capacity." The prefect then confessed that the chief engineer was neither the originator of the plan nor the author of the works, but they both belonged to a modest, subordinate man unknown to fame. . . . He appointed the young man . . . chief engineer, and took him to Paris.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 2.

5505. TALENT, Education of. Alexander. Alexander owed all these advantages to the excellent education which Aristotle gave him. He had also a taste for the whole circle of arts, but such as becomes a prince—that is, he knew the value and usefulness of them. Music, painting, sculpture, architecture, flourished in his reign, because they found in him both a skilful judge and a generous protector, who was able to distinguish and reward merit wherever displayed. But he despised certain trifling feats of dexterity that were of no use. Much admiration was lavished on a man who employed himself very earnestly in throwing small peas through the eye of a needle, which he would do at a considerable distance, and without once missing. Alexander seeing him thus engaged, ordered him, as we are told, a present suitable to his employment—viz., a basket of peas.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 1.

5506. TALENT, Indications of. Mathematics. Carlyle says that the best indication in a boy of a superior understanding is a turn for mathematics. When a boy, in addition to a decided mathematical gift, possesses also a natural dexterity in handling tools, and an inclination to observe nature, there is ground for believing that, if properly aided, he will become a man of science. We were led to these remarks by observing that the four men of modern times who did most to increase the sum of knowledge—Copernicus, Columbus, Galileo, and Newton—were all natural mathematicians, and owed their discoveries directly to mathematics. All of them, also, possessed that manual dexterity and that love of observing nature of which we have spoken. They were alike in other respects: all of them were endowed with an amazing patience. All of them were men of childlike simplicity of character. All of them were good citizens, as well as sublime geniuses. All of them, but Columbus perhaps, were even sound men of business—prudent and successful in the management of their private affairs.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 204.

5507. TALENT, Lack of. Confederate Congress. The Confederate congress . . . of 1863. It is not to be disguised that this body fell below the spirit and virtue of the people, and was remarkable for its destitution of talents and ability. Not a single speech that has yet been made in it will live.—POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 9, p. 226.

5508. TALENT overestimated. Napoleon I. [Entering unannounced, he discovered the Empress Maria Louisa making an omelet.] "How," exclaimed the emperor, "are you making an omelet? You know nothing about it. I will show you how it is done." He immediately took his place at the table, and went to work. . . . The omelet was at last made, and one side was fried. Now came the difficulty of turning it by tossing it over with artistic skill in the frying-pan. Napoleon in the attempt awkwardly tossed it upon the floor. Smiling he said, "I have given myself credit for more exalted talents than I possess;" and he left.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 11.

5509. TALENT, Untaught. Zerah Colburn. He was able, during the later years of his youth, to explain the processes by which he performed his calculations, some of which were so simple that they have since been employed in the New England schools. We have seen a class of boys, not more than twelve years of age, multiply six figures by six figures, without slate and pencil, by the method of Zerah Colburn. His mode of extracting the square root also can be acquired by boys quick at figures. But this does not lessen our astonishment that a boy of seven years, wholly untaught, should have discovered methods in calculation that had escaped the vigilance of mathematicians, from the days of Euclid to our own time.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 83.

5510. TALENTS misjudged. Charles XII. No one, it appears, expected much of this youthful monarch. He had no vices, it is true; he neither drank nor gormandized nor gambled. A Spartan soldier was not more temperate, nor more hardy, nor more chaste than he. But he was haughty, reserved, and obstinate, and seemed to care for nothing but hunting and the drilling of his troops. The ambassadors residing at his court wrote home to their masters that this new king was stupid, and was not likely ever to be formidable to his neighbors. His own subjects, seeing that he did nothing but hunt and attend parades, considered him inferior to his ancestors. [He became one of the great rulers and captains of Europe.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 434.

5511. TALISMANS, Belief in. West Indians. Besides the Zemes, each cacique had three idols or talismans, which were mere stones, but which were held in great reverence by themselves and their subjects. One they supposed had the power to produce abundant harvests, another to remove all pain from women in travail, and the third to call forth rain or sunshine. Three of these were sent home by Columbus to the sovereigns.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 6, ch. 10.

5512. TARIFF, Protection by. First Congress. They did not even wait for the inauguration of President Washington, but began nearly a month before that important event to prepare a revenue bill, . . . declaring that "it is necessary for the support of the government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on imported goods, wares, and merchandise."—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS, ch. 9, p. 183.

5513. TASTE conditioned. Climate. It may be said, therefore, in praise of Epaminondas, that he falsified the proverb which treated the Boeotians as boorish and stupid. This was the notion commonly entertained of them; and it was imputed to the gross air of the country, as the Athenian delicacy of taste was attributed to the subtlety of the air they breathed.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 12, ch. 1, § 7.

5514. TASTE for Literature. Alexander. After the battle of Arbela the Macedonians had found among the spoils of Darius a gold casket (enriched with precious stones), in which the exquisite perfumes used by that prince were put; Alexander, who was quite covered with dust, and regardless of essences and perfumes, destined this rich casket to hold Homer's poems, which he considered the most perfect and the most precious production of the human mind. He admired particularly the Iliad, which he called "the best provision for a warrior." He always had with him that edition of Homer which Aristotle had revised and corrected, and to which the title of the "Edition of the Casket" was given; and he laid it, with his sword, every night under his pillow.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 1.

5515. TAX on Consumption. English Colonies. After two years' discussion, an act of Parliament . . . imposed a duty of ninepence on every gallon of rum, sixpence on every gallon of molasses, and five shillings on every hundred weight of sugar imported from foreign colonies into any of the British plantations. . . . Duty on molasses had all the effect of a prohibition, and led only to clandestine importations.—BANCROFT'S U. S.

5516. TAX, Enormous. Henry VIII. [In 1523 Parliament voted a tax of two shillings on a pound, on the valuation of goods or land. Goods valued at less than twenty pounds to pay sixteen pence on a pound. And if worth less than forty shillings, the tax would be eightpence. In 1525 a subsidy was demanded by the king without the intervention of Parliament.] Commissioners were appointed to levy the illegal claim of the sixth part of every man's substance. . . . The resistance was universal. [It was not collected.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 18, p. 296.

5517. TAX, Excise. Reign of George III. A.D. 1763. [An excise on cider and perry was proposed by George Grenville in Parliament.] The cider counties were in a flame; the city of London, proceeding beyond all precedent, petitioned commons, lords, and king against the measure; and the cities of Exeter and Worcester instructed their members to oppose it. The House of Lords divided upon it, and two protests against it appeared on the journals.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 5.

5518. TAXATION, Exemption from. Clergy. [Reign of Constantine.] The whole body of the Catholic clergy, more numerous perhaps than the legions, was exempted by the emperors from all service, private or public, all municipal offices, and all personal taxes and contributions, which pressed on their fellow-citizens with intolerable weight; and the duties of their holy profession were accepted as a full discharge of their obligations to the republic.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20, p. 283.

5519. TAXATION inevitable. Reign of Galerius. A very minute survey appears to have been taken of their real estates; and wherever there was the slightest suspicion of concealment, torture was very freely employed to obtain a sincere declaration of their personal wealth. . . . The conquest of Macedonia, as we have already observed, had delivered the Roman people from the weight of personal taxes. Though they had experienced every form of despotism, they had now enjoyed that exemption near five hundred years; nor could they patiently brook the insolence of an Illyrian peasant, who, from his distant residence in Asia, presumed to number Rome among the tributary cities of his empire. The rising fury of the people was encouraged by the authority, or at least the connivance, of the senate, and the feeble remains of the Prætorian guards.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14, p. 460.

5520. TAXATION, Odious. Stamp Act. [Its provisions were briefly these:] Every note, bond, deed, mortgage, lease, license, and legal document of whatever sort required in the colonies should, after the first day of the following November, be executed on paper bearing an English stamp. This stamped paper was to be furnished by the British government, and for each sheet the colonists were required to pay a sum varying, according to the nature of the document, from threepence to six pounds sterling. Every colonial pamphlet, almanac, and newspaper was required to be printed on paper of the same sort, the value of the stamps in this case ranging from a half-penny to fourpence; every advertisement was taxed two shillings. No contract should be of any binding force unless written on paper bearing the royal stamp. The news of the hateful act swept over America like a thundercloud. . . . The muffled bells of Philadelphia and Boston rung a funeral peal; and the people said it was the death-knell of liberty. In New York a copy of the Stamp Act was carried through the streets with a death's-head nailed to it, and a placard bearing this inscription: "The Folly of England and the Ruin of America."—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 37, p. 289.

5521. TAXATION by Representatives. American Revolution. The more immediate cause of the Revolution was the passage by Parliament of a number of acts destructive of colonial liberty. These acts were resisted by the colonies, and the attempt was made by Great Britain to enforce them with the bayonet. The subject of this unjust legislation, which extended over a period of twelve years just preceding the war, was the question of taxation. It is a well-grounded principle of English common law that the people, by their representatives in the House of Commons, have the right of voting whatever taxes and customs are necessary for the support of the kingdom. The American colonists claimed the full rights of Englishmen. With good reason it was urged that the general assemblies of colonies held the same relation to the American people as did the House of Commons to the people of England. The English ministers replied that Parliament and not the colonial assemblies was the proper body to vote taxes in any and all parts of the British empire. "But we are not represented in Parliament," was the answer of the Americans; "the House of Commons may therefore justly assess taxes in England, but not in America." "Many of the towns, boroughs, and shires in these British isles have no representatives in Parliament, and yet the Parliament taxes them," replied the ministers, now driven to sophistry. "If any of your towns, boroughs, and shires are not represented in the House of Commons, they ought to be," was the American rejoinder; and there the argument ended. Such were the essential points of the controversy.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 37, p. 286.

5522. TAXATION resisted, Illegal. New Hampshire Colony, 1684. [Charles II. appointed Edward Canfield, a notorious fortune-seeker, governor, who expected a harvest of fines and forfeitures.] Illegal taxes could not be gathered; associations were formed for mutual support in resisting their collection. At Exeter the sheriff was driven off with clubs, and the farmers' wives had prepared hot water to scald his officer if he had attempted to attach property in the house. At Hampton he was beaten, robbed of his sword, seated upon a horse, with a rope round his neck, and conveyed out of the province. . . . Rioters . . . were rescued by a new riot; if . . . the militia were ordered out, not a man obeyed the summons.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 12.

5523. TAXATION, Ruinous. France. As if the protection of manufactures needed restrictions on the exchanges of the products of the earth, the withering prohibition of the export of grain had doomed large tracts of land to lie desolately fallow. Indirect taxes, to the number of at least ten thousand, bringing with them custom-houses between provinces, and custom-houses on the frontier, and a hundred thousand tax-gatherers, left little "to the peasant but eyes to weep with."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 2.

5524. TAXATION by Stamps. Stamp-tax in Colonies. Unless stamps were used, marriages would be null, notes of hand valueless, ships at sea prizes to the first captors, suits at law impossible, transfers of real estate invalid, inheritances irreclaimable.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 10.

5525. TAXES, Destructive. Constantine. To these grievances may be added the oppressive taxes. The word indiction, which serves to ascertain the chronology of the middle ages, was derived from the practice of the emperor's signing with his own hand an edict prescribing the annual measure of the tribute to be levied, and the term allowed for payment of it. The measure or quantity was ascertained by a census, or survey, made by persons appointed for that purpose, through all the provinces, who measured the lands, took account of their nature, whether arable, pasture, wood, or vineyard, and made an estimate of their medium value, from an average produce of five years. The numbers of slaves and of cattle were likewise reported, and the proprietors were examined on their oath as to the true state of their affairs. Part of the tribute specified by the indiction was paid in money, and part in the produce of the land; and so exorbitant were these taxes, that the husbandmen found it their interest to let their fields lie uncultivated, as the burdens increased in a greater proportion to the produce than their profits. Hence the agriculture of the Roman provinces was almost ruined, and population, which keeps pace with plenty, gradually diminished.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 3, p. 515.

5526. ———. To Agriculture. Malmesbury writes thus of the year 1092: "On account of the heavy tribute which the king [William II.], while in Normandy, had levied, agriculture failed; of which failure the immediate consequence was a famine. This also gaining ground, a mortality ensued, so general that the dying wanted attendance and the dead burial." [The king had taken all the stores for seeding the following year.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 16, p. 235.

5527. TAXES, Disturbances from. France. [When Anne of Austria held the regency of France, she replenished her empty treasury by levying a] tax upon all articles of merchandise brought for sale to the capital, whether by land or water, levied indiscriminately upon all classes; and it is curious that this impost, less open to objection than others on the score of equity, should have been the proximate cause of the violent disturbances which followed.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 20, § 5.

5528. TAXES legislated. British. That the king could not impose taxes without the consent of Parliament is admitted to have been, from time immemorial, a fundamental law of England. It was among the articles which John was compelled by the barons to sign. Edward I. ventured to break through the rule; but able, powerful, and popular as he was, he encountered an opposition to which he found it expedient to yield. He covenanted accordingly, in express terms, for himself and his heirs, that they would never again levy any aid without the assent and good-will of the estates of the realm. His powerful and victorious grandson attempted to violate this solemn compact; but the attempt was strenuously withstood. At length the Plantagenets gave up the point in despair.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 29.

5529. TAXES, Merciless. Agriculture. Eadner relates that in the merciless taxation of that reign [of Henry I.] the very doors were taken off the houses when the people could no longer pay; and another contemporary writer says that a troop of unhappy cultivators came, on one occasion, to the king's palace, and threw down their ploughshares at his feet, for the capital was exhausted which alone could set the ploughs at work.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 17, p. 247.

5530. TAXES multiplied. Romans in Britain. The great "procurator," or revenue officer, of the province had his subordinates in every city to look after the "curiales" [official persons of landed property, residing within city walls], and to take special care that no lenity interfered with the rigid collection of the poll-tax, the funeral-tax, the auction-tax, the tax on the sale of slaves, the tithe of mining produce, and the tribute of corn, hay, and cattle. Sometimes the levy was just; often it was frightfully oppressive. . . . The curia were bound to collect what was imposed, and were responsible for any deficiency. [Date about A.D. 300.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 3, p. 45.

5531. TAXES, Odious. Reign of Charles II. The tax on chimneys, though less productive, raised far louder murmurs. The discontent excited by direct imposts is, indeed, almost always out of proportion to the quantity of money which they bring into the Exchequer; and the tax on chimneys was, even among direct imposts, peculiarly odious, for it could be levied only by means of domiciliary visits, and of such visits the English have always been impatient to a degree which the people of other countries can but faintly conceive. The poorer householders were frequently unable to pay their hearth money to the day. When this happened, their furniture was distrained without mercy; for the tax was farmed; and a farmer of taxes is, of all creditors, proverbially the most rapacious. The collectors were loudly accused of performing their unpopular duty with harshness and insolence. It was said that, as soon as they appeared at the threshold of a cottage, the children began to wail, and the old women ran to hide their earthen ware. Nay, the single bed of a poor family had sometimes been carried away and sold. The net annual receipt from this tax was £200,000.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 268.

5532. TAXES, Oppressive. Roman. The Roman tax, or capitation, on the proprietors of land would have suffered a rich and numerous class of free citizens to escape. With the view of sharing that species of wealth which is derived from art or labor, and which exists in money or in merchandise, the emperors imposed a distinct and personal tribute on the trading part of their subjects. Some exemptions, very strictly confined both in time and place, were allowed to the proprietors who disposed of the produce of their own estates. Some indulgence was granted to the profession of the liberal arts; but every other branch of commercial industry was affected by the severity of the law. The honorable merchant of Alexandria, who imported the gems and spices of India for the use of the western world; the usurer, who derived from the interest of money a silent and ignominious profit; the ingenious manufacturer, the diligent mechanic, and even the most obscure retailer of a sequestered village, were obliged to admit the officers of the revenue into the partnership of their gain; and the sovereign of the Roman empire, who tolerated the profession, consented to share the infamous salary of public prostitutes. As this general tax upon industry was collected every fourth year, it was styled the Lustral Contribution; and the historian Zosimus laments that the approach of the fatal period was announced by the tears and terrors of the citizens, who were often compelled by the impending scourge to embrace the most abhorred and unnatural methods of procuring the sum at which their property had been assessed.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17, p. 149.

5533. ——. New York. When the Swedes, naturally a quiet and submissive people, resisted the actions of the government, they were visited with additional severity. If there is any more murmuring against the taxes, make them so heavy that the people can do nothing but think how to pay them, said Lovelace [the second Governor of New York] in his instructions to his deputy.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 20, p. 173.

5534. TAXES, Rebellion against. Duty on Cloth. [In 1381 a] bloody riot took place at Rouen, in consequence of the proposal of a new duty upon cloth; the burghers rushed to arms, and having proclaimed a wealthy clothier King of Rouen, insisted on his issuing an edict repealing the tax, and holding up the officers of the revenue to public execration. The unfortunate collectors were plundered, insulted, and violently driven from the city; an attack was next made upon the castle, in which the governor was killed; the clergy were also assaulted and maltreated. . . . The chief authors of the revolt were executed, and the duty upon cloth was levied by threats and force. . . . Emboldened by this success, the court attempted to enforce at Paris an excise-duty upon produce exposed for sale in the markets. The step was energetically resisted; the popular wrath exploded at once, and the capital was in full insurrection. . . . No sooner had the ferment subsided than arrests were made in every part of Paris, and the wretched prisoners, without any public condemnation, were dispatched by a secret and odious mode of execution—they were inclosed in sacks, and thrown at dead of night into the Seine.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 11, § 1.

5535. TAXES, Ruinous. France. A.D. 1774. [Reign of Louis XVI.] The annual expenses largely exceeded the revenue, and extortions to meet the deficit fell on the humble and the weak. Yet the chief financial officers grew enormously rich. . . . The land tax, the poll tax, the best tithe of the produce for the priest, twentieths, military service, taxes on consumption, labor on the highways, crushed the peasantry. The indirect taxes were farmed out to commissioners, who had power to enforce extortionate demands by summarily sending demurrers to the galleys or the scaffold.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 7.

5536. TEACHER punished, The. By Scholars. A schoolmaster, designing to betray the Falerians by means of their children, took them every day out of the city to exercise, keeping pretty close to the walls at first, and when their exercise was over led them in again. By degrees he took them out farther, accustoming them to divert themselves freely, as if they had nothing to fear. At last, having got them altogether, he brought them to the Roman advanced guard, and delivered them up to be carried to Camillus. When he came into his presence, he said he was the schoolmaster of Falerii, but preferring his favor to the obligations of duty, he came to deliver up those children to him, and in them the whole city. This action appeared very shocking to Camillus, and he said to those that were by, "War at best is a savage thing, and wades through a sea of violence and injustice; yet even war itself has its laws, which men of honor will not depart from; nor do they so pursue victory as to avail themselves of acts of villainy and baseness. For a great general should only rely on his own virtue, and not upon the treachery of others." Then he ordered the licitors to tear off the wretch's clothes, to tie his hands behind him, and furnish the boys with rods and scourges, to punish the traitor, and whip him into the city.—PLUTARCH.

5537. TEACHER, Relation of. Aristotle. [King Philip secured him to be the teacher of young Alexander. See No. 3539.] Alexander likewise discovered no less esteem for his master, whom he believed himself bound to love as much as if he had been his father, declaring that he was indebted to the one for living, and to the other for living well. The progress of the pupil was equal to the care and abilities of the preceptor. He grew passionately fond of philosophy, and learned the several branches of it, but with the discrimination suitable to his birth. Aristotle endeavored to improve his judgment by laying down sure and certain rules, by which he might distinguish just and solid reasoning from what is merely specious, and by accustoming him to separate in discourse all such parts as only dazzle from those which are truly solid, and should constitute its whole value.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 1.

5538. TEACHER, Responsibility of. Philip of Macedon. His queen Olympias . . . was delivered . . . of a son, Alexander, justly denominated the Great. On this event, Philip wrote to the philosopher Aristotle in these emphatic words, truly worthy of a king: "Know that a son is born to us. We thank the gods, first, for their excellent gift, and, secondly, that it is bestowed in the age of Aristotle, who, we trust, will render him a son worthy of his father, and a prince worthy of Macedonia."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 3, p. 170.

5539. TEACHER, Value of. To Alexander. I do not know whether any prince in the world had a nobler education than Alexander. He was very conversant in eloquence, poetry, polite learning, the whole circle of arts, and the most abstracted and most sublime sciences. How happy was he in meeting with so great a preceptor! None but an Aristotle was fit for an Alexander. I am overjoyed to find the disciple pay so illustrious a testimony of respect to his master, by declaring he was more indebted to him in one sense than to his father. A man who thinks and speaks in this manner must be fully sensible of the great advantages of a good education.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 19.

5540. TEACHERS, Pay of. Athenian. The Athenian professors were paid by their disciples, according to their mutual wants and abilities; the price appears to have varied from a mina to a talent; and Isocrates himself, who derides the avarice of the sophists, required, in his school of rhetoric, about £30 from each of his hundred pupils. The wages of industry are just and honorable, yet the same Isocrates shed tears at the first receipt of a stipend; the Stoic might blush when he was hired to preach the contempt of money; and I should be sorry to discover that Aristotle or Plato so far degenerated from the example of Socrates as to exchange knowledge for gold. But some property of lands and houses was settled by the permission of the laws, and the legacies of deceased friends, on the philosophic chairs of Athens. Epicurus bequeathed to his disciples the gardens which he had purchased for eighty minæ, or £250, with a fund sufficient for their frugal subsistence and monthly festivals, and the patrimony of Plato afforded an annual rent, which, in eight centuries, was gradually increased from three to one thousand pieces of gold.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 106.

5541. TECHNICALITIES, Strenuous for. Abraham Lincoln. "Judge —," said he, "held the strongest ideas of rigid government and close construction that I ever met. It was said of him on one occasion that he would hang a man for blowing his nose in the street, but he would quash the indictment if it failed to specify which hand he blew with."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 754.

5542. TELEGRAPH, Value of. Treaty of Ghent. On the 18th of February the treaty was ratified by the Senate of the United States, and peace was publicly proclaimed. It was in the interim between the conclusion of the treaty and the reception of the news in the United States that the battle of New Orleans was fought. A telegram would have saved all the bloodshed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 51, p. 414.

5543. TEMPER, Command of. Themistocles. Eurýbiades said: "Do not you know, Themistocles, that in the public games such as rise up before their turn are chastised for it?" "Yes," answered Themistocles; "yet such as are left behind never gain the crown." Eurýbiades, upon this, lifting up his staff, as if he intended to strike him, Themistocles said: "Strike if you please, but hear me." The Lacedæmonians, admiring his command of temper, bade him speak what he had to say.—PLUTARCH'S THEMISTOCLES.

5544. TEMPERAMENT, Changeful. Henry II. [Henry II.] is described as a lamb when in good humor, but a lion or worse than a lion when seriously angry.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 19, p. 279.

5545. TEMPERANCE, Allies of. Tea and Coffee. While tea and coffee were taxed in their liquid state, and families sent to the coffee-house for a quart of the precious infusions, it was observed excess in drinking, especially about London, was somewhat lessened through their use.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 3, p. 38.

5546. TEMPERANCE of Athletes. Grecian. Those who were designed for this profession frequented, from their most tender age, the Gymnasia or Palæstræ, which were a kind of academies maintained for that purpose at the public expense. In these places, such young people were under the direction of different masters, who employed the most effectual methods to inure their bodies for the fatigues of the public games, and to train them for the combats. The regimen they were under was very hard and severe. At first they had no other nourishment than dried figs, nuts, soft cheese, and a coarse heavy sort of bread, called puça. They were absolutely forbidden the use of wine, and enjoined continence.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 10, ch. 3, p. 424.

5547. TEMPERANCE, Beginning in. First Organization. The earliest organization to stem the torrent of intemperance in this republic would seem to have been that of "The Temperate Society of Moreau and Northumberland" (Saratoga Co., N. Y.), which was instigated by Dr. B. J. Clark, of Moreau, in March, 1808, and constituted by the signature of forty-three members, mainly substantial farmers of the two towns named. Their constitution stipulated that "No member shall drink rum, gin, whiskey, wine, or any distilled spirits, or compositions of the same, or any of them, except by the advice of a physician, or in case of actual disease (also excepting wine at public dinners), under penalty of twenty-five cents. Provided, that this article shall not infringe on any religious ordinance." And further, that "No member shall be intoxicated under penalty of fifty cents." And again: "No member shall offer any of said liquors to any other member, or urge any other person to drink thereof, under penalty of twenty-five cents for each offence."—APPLETON'S CYCLOPEDIA, "ABSTINENCE."

5548. TEMPERANCE, German. Respected. It was not enough to have driven the Germans out of Gaul. Cæsar respected their character. He admired their abstinence from wine, their courage, their frugal habits, and their pure morality. But their virtues made them only more dangerous; and he desired to show them that the Roman arm was long and could reach them even in their own homes.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 16, p. 39.

5549. TEMPERANCE and Justice. King Philip. Philip, rising from an entertainment at which he had sitten several hours, was addressed by a woman, who begged him to examine her cause, and to hear several reasons she had to allege, which were not pleasing to him. He accordingly heard it, and gave sentence against her; upon which she replied very calmly: "I appeal." "How!" says Philip, "from your king? To whom, then?" "To Philip when fasting," replied the woman. The manner in which he received this answer would do honor to the most sober prince. He gave the cause a second hearing, acknowledged the injustice of his sentence, and condemned himself to make amends for it.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 14, § 7.

5550. TEMPERANCE by Legislation. Spartans. Particular care was taken to educate the youth according to the laws and manners of the country, in order that, by being early engrafted into them, and confirmed by long habitude, they might become, as it were, a second nature. The hard and sober manner in which they were brought up inspired them during the rest of their lives with a natural taste for frugality and temperance that distinguished them from all other nations, and wonderfully adapted them to support the fatigues of war. Plato observes that this salutary custom had banished from Sparta and all the territory dependent upon it drunkenness, debauchery, and all the disorders that ensue from them; inasmuch that it was a crime punishable by law to drink wine to excess even in the Bacchanalia, which everywhere else were days of license, and on which whole cities gave themselves up to the last excesses.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 10, ch. 1, § 1.

5551. TEMPERANCE, Legislation against. First Congress. The manufacture of glass had been started in Maryland, and the members from that State secured a duty on the foreign article after considerable discussion, and with the significant reservation, in deference to popular habits, that "black quart bottles" should be admitted free.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS, ch. 9, p. 184.

5552. TEMPERANCE by Legislation. England, 1736. A petition against the excessive use of spirituous liquors was presented to the House of Commons from the justices of the peace for Middlesex. The drinking of Geneva [gin], it was alleged, had excessively increased among the people of inferior rank; the constant and excessive use of distilled spirituous liquors had already destroyed thousands, and rendered great numbers of others unfit for labor, debauching their morals, and driving them into every vice. [A tax of 20s. a gallon was laid on gin, and every retailer was required to take out an annual license costing £50. The measure was opposed by the government, because it would reduce the revenue by reducing the consumption. It was opposed because it was a sumptuary law.] Yet the magnitude of the evil certainly warranted some strong legislative measure. It was stated that within the bills of mortality there were twenty thousand houses for retailing spirituous liquors. Sudden deaths from excessive gin-drinking were continually reported in the newspapers. The bill was passed, and to come into operation after the 29th of Sept. On that day the signs of the liquor-shops were put in mourning. Hooting mobs were assembled around the dens where they could no longer get "drunk for a penny and dead-drunk for twopence." The last rag was pawned to carry off a cheap quart or gallon of the beloved liquor. The act was evaded. Hawkers sold a colored mixture in the streets, and pretended chemists opened shops for the sale of "Cholick-water." Fond, playful names, such as "Tom Row," "Make-shift," "The Ladies' Delight," "The Baulk," attracted customers to the old haunts. Informers were rolled in the mud, or pumped upon, or thrown into the Thames. It became necessary in 1743, when the consumption of gin had positively increased, to reduce the excessive duty.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 5, p. 78.

5553. ———. Against the Poor. [Parliament passed an act in 1606] for repressing the odious vice of drunkenness, which vice was described as the overthrow of many good arts and manual trades, the disabling of divers workmen, and the general impoverishing of many good subjects. [The statute was directed against the sins of the humble. The fine of a convicted drunkard was five shillings. The king and his court set the example by their intemperance, but their only fine was the odium of public opinion directed against them.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 22, p. 339.

5554. TEMPERANCE, Mechanical. "Pegs in Cup." The interference of [St. Dunstan] the archbishop with the social customs of the people is one of the stories told to his honor. They were in the habit of quarrelling about the quantity that each man should drink out of the common cup; and he enacted that pegs should be put in the vessels, that no thirsty soul should take more than his just proportion. [He was prime-minister to King Edgar, A.D. 958-975.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 10, p. 146.

5555. TEMPERANCE and Politics. John Locke. [William III. offered him a mission to Brandenburg, which he declined.] "If I have reason to apprehend the cold air of the country, there is yet another thing in it as inconsistent with my constitution, and that is their warm drinking. . . . I imagine, whatever I may do there myself, the knowing what others are doing is at least one half of my business, and I know no such rack in the world to draw out men's thoughts as a well-managed bottle. If, therefore, it were fit for me to advise in this case, I should think it more for the king's interest to send a man of equal parts that could drink his share than the soberest man in the kingdom."—FOWLER'S LOCKE, ch. 4.

5556. TEMPERANCE possible. Prohibition. [In 1652 the House of Commons voted that no wines should be imported into the commonwealth. The French minister told the council "they could not do without our wines." They answered him jocosely that men soon got accustomed to anything; and that as they had, without inconvenience, dispensed with a king, contrary to the general belief, so they could also dispense with French wines.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 10, p. 152.

5557. TEMPERANCE, Practical. Napoleon I. The emperor and empress usually dined alone. The dinner consisted of but one course, prolonged by the dessert. The only wine he drank was a light French wine mingled with water. Ardent spirits he never drank. The dinner usually lasted not more than twenty minutes.—AB-BOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 29.

5558. TEMPERANCE by Prohibition. London. In the statutes of London [A.D. 1299] "it is enjoined that . . . after curfew bell tolled . . . none keep a tavern open for wine or ale."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 25, p. 386.

5559. TEMPERANCE by Reaction. Lacedæmonians. Anachonis, the philosopher, being asked by what means a man might best guard against the vice of drunkenness, answered, "By bearing constantly in his view the loathsome, indecent behavior of such as are intoxicated." Upon this principle was founded the custom of the Lacedæmonians, of exposing their drunken slaves to their children, who by that means conceived an early aversion to a vice which makes men appear so monstrous and irrational.

5560. ——. Young Cyrus. [Young Cyrus visited his grandfather Astyages, the king of the Medes, and playfully served as a cup-bearer.] Astyages embraced him with great fondness, and said, "I am mighty well pleased, my dear child; nobody can serve me with a better grace; but you have forgotten one essential ceremony, which is that of tasting." And indeed the cup-bearer was used to pour some of the liquor into his left hand, and to taste it, before he presented it to the king. "No," replied Cyrus, "it is not through forgetfulness that I omitted that ceremony." "Why, then," said Astyages, "for what reason did you do it?" "Because I apprehended there was poison in the liquor." "Poison, child! How could you think so?" "Yes, poison, papa; for not long ago, at an entertainment you gave to the lords of your court, after the guests had drunk a little of that liquor, I perceived all their heads were turned—they sung, made a noise, and talked they did not know what; you yourself seemed to have forgotten that you were king, and they that they were subjects; and when you would have danced, you could not stand upon your legs." "Why," says Astyages, "have you never seen the same thing happen to your father?" "No, never," says Cyrus. "How is it with him when he drinks?" "Why, when he has drunk, his thirst is quenched, and that's all."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1, § 2.

5561. TEMPERANCE Reformation. Father Mathew. Those unexpected scenes at Limerick decided Father Mathew's future career. He became the Apostle of Temperance. In some of the densely peopled counties of Ireland he administered the pledge to fifty thousand persons a day for some days together. Three millions of the people of Ireland, it is computed, vowed themselves to total abstinence in his presence; and in America his success was not less astonishing.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 112.

5562. TEMPERANCE, Religious. Mahomet. The interdiction of wine, peculiar to some orders of priests or hermits, is converted by Mahomet alone into a positive and general law; and a considerable portion of the globe has abjured, at his command, the use of that salutary though dangerous liquor. These painful restraints are, doubtless, infringed by the libertine and eluded by the hypocrite.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 50, p. 116.

5564. TEMPERANCE, Strict. Mohammedans. [Under Abubeker, the reformer.] The abuse, or even the use, of wine was chastised by fourscore strokes on the soles of the feet, and, in the fervor of their primitive zeal, many secret sinners revealed their fault, and solicited their punishment.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 190.

5565. TEMPLE, Furniture of the. Jewish. The holy instruments of the Jewish worship, the gold table and the gold candlestick with seven branches, originally framed according to the particular instructions of God Himself, and which were placed in the sanctuary of His temple, had been ostentatiously displayed to the Roman people in the triumph of Titus. They were afterward deposited in the temple of Peace; and at the end of four hundred years the spoils of Jerusalem were transferred from Rome to Carthage by a Barbarian who derived his origin from the shores of the Baltic.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 36, p. 464.

5566. TEMPTATION dismissed. Martyr Hooper. [After Hooper's condemnation, the rumor went forth that the fear of death had prevailed over his constancy. He wrote a letter to rebut such rumors, and made this affirmation therein:] "I have taught the truth with my tongue and with my pen heretofore, and hereafter shall shortly confirm the same, by God's grace, with my blood." . . . When, at the stake, he listened to the bitter laments of the common people, who greatly loved him; a pardon was offered him if he would recant; but he exclaimed, "If you love my soul, take it away." When he was fastened by hoops of iron to the stake, he said the trouble was needless, for God would give him strength to abide the extremity of the fire without bands. His sufferings were of the most lingering nature; but he remained calm and still to the last, and while flames were slowly consuming him, died as quietly.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 6.

5567. TEMPTATION, Intentional. Samuel Johnson. There is a very good story told of Sir Godfrey Kneller, in his character of a justice of the peace. A gentleman brought his servant before him, upon an accusation of having stolen some money from him; but it having come out that he had laid it purposely in the servant's way, in order to try his honesty, Sir Godfrey sent the master to prison. JOHNSON: "To resist temptation once is not a sufficient proof of honesty. If a servant, indeed, were to resist the continued temptation of silver lying in a window, as some people let it lie, when he is sure his master does not know how much there is of it, he would give a strong proof of honesty. But this is a proof to which you have no right to put a man. You know, humanly speaking, there is a certain degree of temptation which will overcome any virtue. Now, in so far as you approach temptation to a man, you do him an injury; and if he is overcome, you share his guilt."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 363.

5568. TEMPTATION, Morbid. John Bunyan. He had gained Christ, as he called it. He was now tempted "to sell and part with this most blessed Christ, to exchange Him for the things of this life—for anything. If there had been any real prospect of worldly advantage before Bunyan, which he could have gained by abandoning his religious profession, the words would have had a meaning. . . . And yet he says, "It lay upon me for a year, and did follow me so continually that I was not rid of it one day in a month, sometimes not an hour in many days together, unless when I was asleep. I could neither eat my food, stoop for a pin, chop a stick nor cast my eye to look on this or that, but still the temptation would come, 'Sell Christ for this, sell Him for that! Sell Him! Sell Him!'"—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 3.

5569. TENDERNESS with Courage. Gari-baldi. As a boy he was chiefly remarkable for an extreme tenderness of feeling. When he was a very little boy, he happened, in playing with a grasshopper, to break one of its legs, which afflicted him to such a degree that he could not go on with his play. He went to his room, where he remained for several hours mourning over the irreparable injury he had done the poor insect. But this excessive tenderness did not proceed from weakness of character. Not long after, while playing on the banks of one of those wide and deep ditches which they have in Italy for irrigating the fields, he saw a poor washerwoman, who had fallen into the ditch, struggling for her life, and in imminent danger of drowning. He sprang to her assistance, and, young as he was, he actually succeeded in getting the woman out. He has to this day a lively recollection of the ecstasy which he experienced upon seeing her safe on the bank. In affairs of this nature, calling for the sudden risk of one life for the preservation of another, he has never hesitated, nor even so much as thought of his own danger till the danger was over.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 493.

5571. TENANTS, Regard for. John Howard. As often as he had a cottage completed, he looked about for a sober and diligent tenant for it; so that his cottage-building furnished a most powerful inducement to reform. Besides this, he let his cottages on certain conditions favorable to virtue and good order. One was, that the tenant should go to church once every Sunday; another, that he should never go to the ale-house; another, that he should never gamble; another, that he should let his children go to the school which he had established for them. It was so exceedingly desirable to a poor man to have one of his cottages, with a garden attached, at a rent of about ten dollars a year, that he had no difficulty in inducing the villagers to comply with his conditions.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 37.

5572. TERROR vs. Happiness. Damocles. [Damocles, a courtier of Dionysius the tyrant, was] always repeating, that never man was happier than Dionysius. "Since you are of that opinion," said the tyrant, "will you taste and make proof of my felicity in person?" The offer was accepted with joy. Damocles was placed on a golden couch, covered with carpets, richly embroidered. The sideboards were loaded with vessels of gold and silver. The most beautiful slaves in the most splendid habits stood around, ready to serve him at the slightest signal. The most exquisite essences and perfumes had not been spared. The table was spread with proportionate magnificence. Damocles was all joy, and looked upon himself as the happiest man in the world; when, unfortunately, casting up his eyes he beheld over his head the point of a sword, which hung from the roof only by a single horse-hair. He was immediately seized with a cold sweat; everything disappeared in an instant; he could see nothing but the sword, nor think of anything but his danger. In the height of his fear he desired permission to retire, and declared he would be happy no longer.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 1, § 4.

5573. TERROR, Reign of. France. The Committee of Public Safety . . . commenced by proclaiming a new and hastily framed constitution, of an absurdly democratic and impracticable character, which was inaugurated at a national fête with pagan and atheistical ceremonies on the 10th of August. Next followed a decree for a levy en masse of all citizens capable of bearing arms; another for a forced loan amounting to nearly one year's revenue; another extorting from all landowners and farmers a contribution of two-thirds of their produce in grain for the consumption of the army; another imposing a maximum—that is, a fixed arbitrary price above which no provisions could be sold—upon bread, meat, wine, salt, wood, and other articles. A farther measure—the famous "loi des suspects"—placed the liberty and property of the whole population of France at the uncontrolled disposal of the government, and soon filled the prisons with upward of two hundred thousand miserable captives.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 27, § 4.

5574. TEST for Office. Religious. [Of Parliament enacted under Charles II.] the Test Act provided that all persons holding any office, civil or military, should take the Oath of Supremacy, should subscribe a declaration against transubstantiation, and should publicly receive the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England. The preamble expressed hostility only to the Papists, but the enacting clauses were scarcely more unfavorable to the Papists than to the most rigid class of Puritans.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 208.

5575. TESTIMONY, Christian. For John Bunyan. "One day, in a street in Bedford, as he was at work in his calling, he fell in with three or four poor women sitting at a door in the sun talking about the things of God." He was himself at that time "a brisk talker" about the matters of religion, and he joined these women. Their expressions were wholly unintelligible to him. "They were speaking of the wretchedness of their own hearts—of their unbelief, of their miserable state." Bunyan left the women, and went about his work, but their talk went with him. "He was greatly affected." "He saw that he wanted the true tokens of a godly man." He sought them out and spoke with them again and again. He could not stay away, and the more he went the more he questioned his condition.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 2.

5576. TESTIMONY, Imaginative. Columbus. He mentions in his journal that he saw three mermaids [in the West Indies] which elevated themselves above the surface of the sea, and he observes that he had before seen such on the coast of Africa. He adds that they were by no means the beautiful beings they had been represented, although they possessed some traces of the human countenance. It is supposed that these must have been manati or sea-calves seen indistinctly and at a distance; and that the imagination of Columbus, disposed to give a wonderful character to everything in this new world, had identified these misshapen animals with the sirens of ancient story.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 5, ch. 1.

5577. TESTIMONY, Trial of. Middle Ages. The ignorance of the judges, as well as the weakness of their authority in those rude ages, laid a natural foundation for another singularity in their legal forms, which was the judgment of God. A party accused of a crime was allowed to produce a certain number of witnesses, more or fewer according to the measure of the offence; and if these declared upon oath their belief in the innocence of the accused, it was accounted a sufficient justification. Seventy-two compurgators were required to absolve an incendiary or murderer; and Gregory of Tours relates, that when the chastity of a queen of France was suspected, three hundred nobles swore, without hesitation, that the infant prince had been actually begotten by her deceased husband. It is not improbable that the notorious perjuries occasioned by this absurd practice gave rise to another equally preposterous, and much more dangerous to the unhappy criminal. It was in the option of the judge to condemn the party accused to undergo the trial of cold water, of boiling water, or of red-hot iron. They began with the performance of the mass, and the accused person solemnly took the sacrament. If the trial was by cold water, the priest gave his benediction to the water, and performed exorcism, to expel evil spirits. The culprit, tied hand and foot, was then thrown into a pool of water; where, if he sank to the bottom, and probably was drowned, it was a proof of his innocence; but if he swam above, he was accounted certainly guilty, and condemned to death accordingly. The trial by hot water was performed by making the accused person plunge his naked arm into a vessel of boiling water, and fetch from the bottom a consecrated ring. The arm was immediately put into a bag, and sealed up by the judge, to be opened after three days; when, if there were no marks of burning, the culprit was declared innocent. It is well known that there are compositions which powerfully resist the immediate effects of fire, and which, in all probability, were not unknown in those days when there was so much occasion for them. The third proof was by holding in the hand, for a certain space of time, a red-hot iron, or by walking barefooted over several burning ploughshares or bars of iron. Perhaps it might be possible to elude even the dangers of this experiment, though certainly more difficult than the last. Another ordeal was of a gentler sort; it was performed by consecrating a piece of barley-bread and cheese, and giving it to the accused to eat, who, if he was not choked by it, was declared innocent.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 79.

5578. THANKS expressed. S. Johnson. Mr. Sheridan told me that when he communicated to Dr. Johnson that a pension was to be granted him, he replied in a fervor of gratitude, "The English language does not afford me terms adequate to my feelings on this occasion. I must have recourse to the French. I am pénétré with his Majesty's goodness."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 103.

5579. THANKSGIVING, Duty of. Neglected. [Henry Dorsey Gough, a wealthy Maryland planter,] was riding to one of his plantations under a state of religious awakening. He heard the voice of prayer and praise in a cabin, and, listening, discovered that a negro from a neighboring estate was leading the devotions of his own slaves, and offering fervent thanksgivings for the blessings of their depressed lot. His heart was touched, and, with emotion, he exclaimed, "Alas, O Lord, I have my thousands, and tens of thousands, and yet, ungrateful wretch that I am, I never thanked Thee, as this poor slave does, who has scarcely clothes to put on, or food to satisfy his hunger!" [He never forgot the lesson.]—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 1, p. 236.

5580. THANKSGIVING, Threesfold. Thales. [He was one of the seven wise men of Greece.] He used to thank the gods for three things: that he was born a reasonable creature, and not a beast; a man, and not a woman; a Greek, and not a Barbarian. Upon his mother's pressing him to marry when he was young, he told her it was then too soon; and, after several years were elapsed, he told her it was then too late.—ROLIN'S HIST., Book 5, art. 9.

5581. THANKSGIVING for Victory. Spanish Armada. [In 1589, after the dispersion of the famous Spanish Armada by the British fleet of one half its tonnage, a national thanksgiving celebrated the victory.] On Sunday the 24th of November, Elizabeth rode in a chariot to Saint Paul's, in the most magnificent of dresses; and the streets were hung with blue cloth; and the companies of the city stood on both sides in goodly order, and the trophies were carried in procession; and the great captains of England's Salamis were about their queen; and she graciously saluted them by name; and a solemn thanksgiving was offered up, and the glory given to God only. On that day there were also given in every church in the land "public and general thanks unto God, with all devotion and inward affection of heart and humbleness for His gracious favor extended toward us in our deliverance and defence, in the wonderful overthrow and destruction shown by His mighty hand on our malicious enemies, the Spaniards, who had thought to evade and make a conquest of the realm."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 15, p. 237.

5582. THEATRES, Corrupted. English. Eighteenth Century. In theatrical representations of life there was scarcely an attempt to exhibit a woman of sense and modesty.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 27.

5583. THEATRES, Dangers of. S. Johnson. He for a considerable time used to frequent the Green-room, and seemed to take delight in dissipating his gloom by mixing in the sprightly chit-chat of the motley circle then to be found there. Mr. David Hume related to me from Mr. Garrick, that Johnson at last denied himself that amusement, from consideration of rigid virtue, saying: "I'll come no more behind your scenes, David; for the silk stockings and white bosoms of your actresses excite my amorous propensities."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 51.

5584. THEATRES, Licentiousness and. England. Not the least of the opposing influences (against the promotion of Christian knowledge) was the licentiousness of the stage. In 1697, Sunderland as Lord Chamberlain had issued an order to prevent the profaneness and immorality of the acted drama. The Master of the Revels probably made no attempt to remonstrate against performances of which the whole structure of the action was to represent chastity as the thin disguise of scheming women, and the pursuit of adultery as the proper business of refined gentlemen; to make the sober citizen the butt of the profligates who invaded his domestic hearth; to exhibit the triumphs of intellect in the schemes of venal lackeys to aid the intrigues of their masters, and of odious waiting-maids to surround their mistresses with opportunities of temptation. Burnet was pretty right in his antithesis—"The stage is the great corrupter of the town, and the bad people of the town have been the chief corrupters of the stage."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 13, p. 206.

5585. THEATRES, Opposition to. Dr. Dawson. [In one of the churches in London, about 1630, one Dr. Dawson read the "Book of Sports," and presently after read the Ten Commandments, then said]: "Dearly Beloved, you have heard now the commandments of God and man, obey which you please." [The "Book of Sports" defined certain amusements as lawful.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 26, p. 415.

5586. ——. Punished. [In 1633, William Prynne was fined £5000, had his ears cut off, and his book "Histrio-Mastix, the Player's Scourge," burned by the hangman under his nose; he was also sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. This was the punishment inflicted by the Star Chamber for writing against "Stage Plays."]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 26, p. 411.

5587. THEATRES restored. The Restoration. A.D. 1662. The drama came back in the shameless garb, and with the brazen look, and the drunken voice of the lowest strumpet. The people were to be taught that Shakespeare was a barbarian, and not to be tolerated in his own simplicity. He was, if heard at all, to furnish the libretto of an opera, to be got up with dresses and decorations by Sir William D'Avenant. . . . The theatre was at the height of fashion when it was most shameless. The actresses were removed from "The King's House," to become the mistresses of the king, by their gradual promotion from being the mistresses of the king's servants.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 17, p. 296.

5588. THEATRES and Sensuality. Roman. Ovid employs two hundred lines in the research of places the most favorable to love. Above all, he considers the theatre as the best adapted to collect the beauties of Rome, and to melt them into tenderness and sensuality.—NOTE IN GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 268.

5589. THEATRES vicious. Reign of Charles II. The play-houses, shut by the meddling fanatic in the day of his power, were again crowded. [After the restoration of Charles II.] The fascination of sex was called in to aid the fascination of art; and the young spectator saw, with emotions unknown to the contemporaries of Shakespeare and Jonson, tender and sprightly heroines personified by lovely women. From the day on which the theatres were reopened, they became seminaries of vice, and the evil propagated itself. The profligacy of the representations soon drove away sober people. The frivolous and dissolute who remained required every year stronger and stronger stimulants. Thus, the artists corrupted the spectators, and the spectators the artists, till the turpitude of the drama became such as must astonish all who are not aware that extreme relaxation is the natural effect of extreme restraint, and that an age of hypocrisy is, in the regular course of things, followed by an age of impudence. Nothing is more characteristic of the times than the care with which the poets contrived to put all their loosest verses into the mouths of women. The compositions in which the greatest license was taken were the epilogues. They were almost always recited by favorite actresses; and nothing charmed the depraved audience so much as to hear lines grossly indecent repeated by a beautiful girl, who was supposed to have not yet lost her innocence."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 373.

5590. ——. English. 1774. The stage at this period was either a school of immorality or a vehicle of slander.—MASSEY, IN KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 5, p. 98.

5591. THEATRICALS in Churches. Scriptural Events. [The plays in the sixteenth century were mostly representative of Scripture events and characters, even the most sacred; they were originally performed in the churches, and the priests were often the performers. It was common to the pleasure-seekers of that day to witness the Creation and the Fall; the Flood; the Israelites in Egypt; the Salutation and Adoration of the Shepherds; Christ before Pilate; the Resurrection; the Ascension and Doomsday. The great festival days were usually selected for their performance.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 29, p. 494.

5592. THEATRICALS condemned. By Solon. [Solon was one of the seven wise men of Greece.] Solon went among the rest for the sake of hear ing Thespis, who acted himself, according to the custom of the ancient poets. When the play was ended, he called to Thespis, and asked him, "Whether he was not ashamed to utter such lies before so many people?" Thespis made answer, "That there was no harm in lies of that sort, and in poetical fictions, which were made only for diversion." "No," replied Solon, giving a great stroke with his stick upon the ground; "but if we suffer and approve of lying for our own diversion, it will quickly find its way into our serious engagements, and all our business and affairs."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 5, art. 8.

5593. THEFT, Adroit. Gylippus. Lysander had sent Gylippus, who had commanded the army in Sicily, before him, to carry the money and spoils, which were the fruit of his glorious campaigns, to Lacedæmon. The money, without reckoning the innumerable crowns of gold given him by the cities, amounted to 1500 talents, that is to say, 1,500,000 crowns. Gylippus, who carried this considerable sum, could not resist the temptation of converting some part of it to his own use. The bags were sealed up carefully and did not seem to leave any room for theft. He unsewed them at the bottom; and, after having taken out of each of them what money he thought fit, to the amount of 300 talents, he sewed them up again very neatly, and thought himself perfectly safe. But when he arrived at Sparta, the accounts which had been put up in each bag discovered him. To avoid punishment, he banished himself from his country. [It occasioned a decree that punishing with death any citizen having in his possession gold coin.]—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 8, ch. 2, § 7.

5594. THEFT, Cautious. Spartans. An Iren was one that had been two years out of the class of boys; a Melliren one of the oldest lads. This Iren, then, a youth twenty years old, gives orders to those under his command, in their little battles, and has them to serve him at his house. He sends the oldest of them to fetch wood, and the younger to gather pot-herbs: these they steal where they can find them, either slyly getting into gardens, or else craftily and warily creeping to the common tables. But if any one be caught, he is severely flogged for negligence or want of dexterity. They steal too, whatever victuals they possibly can, ingeniously contriving to do it when persons are asleep or keep but indifferent watch. If they are discovered, they are punished not only with whipping, but with hunger. Indeed, their supper is but slender at all times, that, to fence against want, they may be forced to exercise their courage and address. . . . The boys steal with so much caution, that one of them having conveyed a young fox under his garment, suffered the creature to tear out his bowels with his teeth and claws, choosing rather to die than to be detected.—PLUTARCH'S "LYCURGUS."

5595. THEFT, Educated for. Spartans. Theft was a part of the system of education at Lacedæmon. Children were sent out to steal from the public markets and gardens, from the butchers' stalls, and even from private houses. If unsuccessful, they were punished with the loss of a meal; if detected in the theft, they were scourged with severity. It is a lame apology for an institution of this kind to say that it habituated them early to stratagems of war, to danger, and to vigilance. The talents of a thief are very different from the virtues of a warrior.—TITLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9, p. 95.

5596. THEFT, Punishment of. Prince. When a prince of the royal blood of France disgraced himself by committing robbery and murder in the streets of Paris, Louis XV. would not grant a pardon, though eagerly solicited to do so by a deputation from the Parliament of Paris, who tried him and suspended their sentence until the royal pleasure should be known. "My lords and counsellors," said the king, "return to your chambers of justice, and promulgate your decree." "Consider," said the first President, "that the unhappy prince has your Majesty's blood in his veins." "Yes," said the king, "but the blood has become impure, and justice demands that it should be let out; nor would I spare my own son, for a crime for which I should be bound to condemn the meanest of my subjects." The prince was executed on the scaffold in the court of the Grand Châtelet, on the 12th of August, 1729.

5597. THEOCRACY, American. Jews—Puritans. New England, like Canaan, had been settled by fugitives. Like the Jews, they had fled to a wilderness; like the Jews, they looked to Heaven for a light to lead them on; like the Jews, they had no supreme ruler but God; like the Jews, they had heathen for their foes; and they derived their legislation from the Jewish code.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 19.

5598. THEOLOGY, Difficulties in. Infinite Deity. Hiero . . . asked Simonides his opinion with regard to the nature and attributes of the Deity. The latter desired one day's time to consider of it; the next day he asked two, and went on increasing in the same proportion. The prince pressing him to give his reasons for these delays, he confessed that the subject was above his comprehension and that the more he reflected, the more obscure it appeared to him.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 7, ch. 2, § 1.

5599. THEOLOGY, Effects of. Cromwell. Was not merely his speech, but deep, far beneath his speech, lay his great thoughts of God: and unless you understand his inner depth of vital conviction, you will have no comprehension of the man. . . . Manton, himself one of the greatest of these writers, says Cromwell had a large and well-selected library. Many of our most famous pieces were then unwritten; but there were some pieces of Smith, Caudray, Adams, Owen, Goodwin, and Mede, and the earlier fathers, and Calvin, and Hooker, and Herbert's lyrics. We think such were the men with whom Cromwell walked and mused, and whose writings shed light into his soul.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 1, p. 21.

5600. THEOLOGY, Philosopher's. Anaxagoras. Anaxagoras, . . . deviating most from the vulgar errors and superstition, . . . was accused of impiety. He taught that the first efficient principle of all things was an immaterial and intelligent Being, existing from all eternity; that the substratum, or subject of His operations, was matter, which likewise existed from all eternity in a chaotic state, comprehending the confused rudiments of all different substances, which the intelligent mind of the Creator first separated, and then combined for the formation of the universe, and of all bodies, animate and inanimate. It is true that Thales propagated the doctrine of an eternal mind, the Creator and Ruler of the universe; but he, like most of the ancient philosophers, seemed to consider this mind as united to matter, which was animated by it, as the body is by the soul.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 262.

5601. ——. Plato. The most celebrated of the disciples of Socrates was Plato, a philosopher whose doctrines have had a more extensive and a more lasting empire over the minds of mankind than those perhaps of any other of the ancients. Plato, a native of Ægina, and thus by his country an Athenian, was born about 430 B.C. . . . It was Plato's fundamental doctrine that from nothing, nothing can proceed. Believing, therefore, in the eternal existence of the Deity, he believed likewise in the eternity of matter, as the substratum . . . of the Deity's operations. This matter, however, was in a chaotic state, and endowed with no qualities whatever, till the eternal mind conferred these qualities upon it, reduced it into order, and thus formed the beautiful fabric of the universe, of which the idea or archetype had existed from all eternity in Himself. But in chaotic matter Plato conceived that as there was an original deformity, so there was a natural resistance to that perfect order and excellence which the Deity sought to produce, but which He could not entirely overcome; and hence the origin of that evil which partially contaminates His works. yet here the philosopher seems himself to perceive the objection from the boundless power of the Divinity, as he expresses himself with great obscurity on the subject. His notions of God, however, are not only most sublime, but extremely refined. He conceived that the divine nature consisted of three distinct essences, states, or hypostases: the first a pure and self-existent Essence, whose sole attribute was goodness, . . . the second he conceived to be Mind, the wisdom or reason of the first, and the proper Creator of the universe, . . . the third he conceived to be the Soul of the world; as he conceived the activity of created matter to infer an inhabiting mind, . . . simply . . . (the soul) or . . . soul of the world. The second hypostasis he supposed to be an emanation from the first, and the third from both. Such is the Platonic Trinity, bearing, in its general description, a strong resemblance to the Christian; but differing in this material point, that in the former the second and third persons are subordinate and inferior to the first.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 271.

5602. ——. Stoics. The Stoical doctrines have had a very extensive prevalence and duration; and though in some particulars palpably erroneous, may be accounted, on the whole, more consonant to right reason and more favorable to the practice of virtue than those of any other sect of the philosophy of the ancients. According to the Stoics, the whole universe, and God Himself, the Creator and soul of that universe, are regulated by certain laws, which are immutable, and resulting from necessity.

The actions of God Himself are regulated by those general laws; yet in one sense they may be considered as free and voluntary, viz., that as there is nothing external of the universe which God pervades, and which His soul regulates, there is nothing external of Himself which can impel or necessitate him. Man, according to the notions of the Stoics, is a part of the Divinity. The human soul is a portion of that great soul which pervades the universe. The will of man is subject, like the divine will, to unalterable laws; yet it is virtually free, because man believes himself a free agent, and his conduct is influenced by that belief. He obeys voluntarily and from inclination that destiny which he must have obeyed ab ante, though he had not inclined it. Man being a part of the universe which is regulated by God, cannot complain that he is bound by the same laws which regulate and bind universal nature, and even God Himself. The wise man, therefore, never considers what is good or evil with respect to himself. Whatever happened to him must necessarily have happened according to the order of nature; because had it not been necessary, it would not have happened. The pains and pleasures of an individual are, therefore, unworthy of the regard of Him who attends to the universal good; his pains and pleasures are determined by the same law which determined his existence. He cannot repine that he exists, for at whom shall he repine? He existed by the necessity of nature. Virtue, in the opinion of a Stoic, was nothing more than a manly resolution to accommodate the unalterable laws of nature. Vice was a weak and dastardly endeavor to oppose those laws. Vice, therefore, was folly, and virtue the only true wisdom.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 278.

5603. THEOLOGY ridiculous. Egyptian. In theology, too, while the superstitious worship of the common people was so grossly absurd as to draw on them the ridicule of all other nations, the secret doctrines of the priests are generally allowed to have been pure, refined, and rational. One Great Intelligence was supposed to preside over all nature. Subordinate spirits, portions of that Intelligence, presided over the actions of mankind, as the guardians of the human soul, which was derived from the same divine original, but was destined to undergo a certain number of transmigrations through different bodies, before it was reunited to the great parent-spirit. They believed in the immortality of the soul. Diodorus tells us that they esteemed the present state of existence to be of no value in comparison with that which was to come, and which was to be the reward of a life spent in this world in the practice of virtue.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 43.

5604. THEORETICAL vs. Practical. Webster—Clay. While Mr. Webster is so honorably perpetuated by his elaborate and masterly discussion of great principles in the Senate, he did not connect himself with a single historic measure. While Mr. Clay's speeches remain unread, his memory is lastingly identified with issues that are still vital and powerful. He advanced the doctrine of protection to the stately dignity of the American system.—BLAINE'S TWENTY YEARS OF CONGRESS, p. 107.

5605. THIEVES protected. By Law. A.D. 1194. Chester fair, in the time of John, was a great resort of vagabonds; for by the charter of the city no one could be there apprehended for any theft or misdeed, except it were committed in the fair.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 22, p. 329.

5606. THOUGHT conditioned. By Respiration. Swedenborg, with amazing observation and sagacity, has made a regular study of this ratio between the respiration and the thoughts and emotions; he shows in detail that the two correspond exactly, and, moreover, that their correspondence is one of the long-sought links between the soul and the body, whereby every thought is represented and carried out momentarily in the expanse of the human frame. It is difficult to give a more plain or excellent reason of the tie between the body and the soul, than that the latter finds the body absolutely to its mind; while, on the other hand, the living body clings to the soul, because it wants a friendly superior life to infuse and direct its life.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 6, p. 53.

5607. THOUGHT, Flexibility of. Julian. [The Emperor Julian was] an author, a pontiff, a magistrate, a general, and a prince. In one and the same day he gave audience to several ambassadors, and wrote, or dictated, a great number of letters to his generals, his civil magistrates, his private friends, and the different cities of his dominions. He listened to the memorials which had been received, considered the subject of the petitions, and signified his intentions more rapidly than they could be taken in shorthand by the diligence of the secretaries. He possessed such flexibility of thought and such firmness of attention that he could employ his hand to write, his ear to listen, and his voice to dictate, and pursue at once three several trains of ideas without hesitation and without error.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 22, p. 394.

5608. THOUGHT, Food for. Observation. As the fall of apples from a tree led Newton to the theory of gravitation, so the slow and uniform swinging of a lamp, suspended from the roof of the Pisa cathedral, suggested to Galileo the idea of the pendulum as a measurer of time and as a motive-power of clocks. It was fifty years later, however, before he actually constructed a pendulum clock.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 262.

5609. THOUGHT suggested. Sir Robert Peel. Farmers in those days generally used pewter plates at table. It happened one day that Robert Peel drew a pattern for calico on the back of one of his dinner-plates, and while he was looking at it, the thought occurred to him that perhaps if he should spread color upon it, and apply the requisite degree of pressure, he could get an impression on calico. In a cottage close to his farm-house lived a woman who had one of those machines for smoothing fabrics which worked by rollers. Having applied color to his pattern, and placed calico over it, he passed his plate between the rollers of this calendaring machine. He was delighted to find that an excellent impression was made upon the calico, and thus was begun the invention of the process by which to this day calico is printed.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 714.

5610. THOUGHTS, Serious. Samuel Johnson. "Alas! sir," said Johnson, speaking, when in another mood, of grand houses, fine gardens, and splendid places of public amusement, "alas! sir, these are only struggles for happiness. When I first entered Ranelagh it gave an expansion and gay sensation to my mind such as I never experienced anywhere else. But as Xerxes when he viewed his immense army, and considered that not one of that great multitude would be alive a hundred years afterward, so it went to my heart to consider that there was not one in all that brilliant circle that was not afraid to go home and think."—NOTE IN IRVING'S GOLDSMITH, ch. 35, p. 203.

5611. THREATS, Government by. Cardinal Wolsey. [When Cardinal Wolsey, in 1525, resorted to the old trick of voluntary "benevolence," the rich yielded to the irregular exactions] in the form of gifts and loans, under the terror of such speeches as one which Wolsey made to the mayor and aldermen of London: "It were better that some should suffer indigence than the king at this time should lack; and therefore beware, and resist not, nor ruffle not in this case, for it may fortune to cost some their heads."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 19, p. 303.

5612. THREATS ridiculed. Napoleon I. [After defeating 200,000 Austrians, he marched against the pope's terrified army, under Cardinal Busca, intrenched upon the banks of the Senio.] Senio . . . sent a flag of truce, who very pompously . . . declared, in the name of the cardinal-in-chief, that if the French continued to advance he should certainly fire upon them. The terrible menace was reported through the French lines, and was received with perfect peals of merriment. Napoleon replied that he should be exceedingly sorry to expose himself to the cardinal's fire, and that, therefore, as the army was very much fatigued, with the cardinal's leave it would take up its quarters for the night.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 7.

5613. TIME, Changes by. Samuel Johnson. Mr. Wilkes has, however, favored me with one repartee of Pope. . . . Johnson, after justly censuring him for having "nursed in his mind a foolish disesteem of kings," tells us, "yet a little regard shown him by the Prince of Wales melted his obduracy; and he had not much to say when he was asked by his Royal Highness how he could love a prince, while he disliked kings. The answer which Pope made was, 'The young lion is harmless, and even playful; but when his claws are full grown he becomes cruel, dreadful, and mischievous.'"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 444.

5614. TIME, Detention of. Napoleon I. [He arrived with his battle-worn army on the plains of Waterloo too late in the evening to accomplish his desire.] As the light was fading away he pointed toward the visible sun, and said, "What would I not give to be this day possessed of the power of Joshua, and enabled to retard thy march for two hours!"—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 27.

5615. TIME, Estimate of. Napoleon I. [He, with 30,000 men, defeated 50,000 Austrians at the battle of Rivoli.] "The Austrians," said he, "manœuvred admirably, and failed only because they are incapable of calculating the value of minutes."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 7.

5616. TIME, Investment of. *Napoleon I. [Napoleon, with others, was quartered at the house of a barber at Auxonne. Some spent their time coquetting with the barber's pretty wife; he with his books in hard study.] A few years after, as Napoleon, then commander of the army of Italy, was on his way to Marengo, . . . he stopped at the door of the barber's shop, and asked his former hostess if she remembered a young officer by the name of Bonaparte who was once quartered in her family. "Indeed, I do," was her pettish reply, "and a very disagreeable inmate he was. He was always either shut up in his room, or, if he walked out, he never condescended to speak to any one." "Ah! my good woman," Napoleon rejoined, "had I passed my time as you wished to have me, I should not now have been in command of the army of Italy."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

5617. TIME, Purchase of. *Valuable. [When the army of Sertorius came to the] mountains adjoining Spain, the Barbarians insisted that he should pay toll, and purchase his passage over them. Those that attended him were fired with indignation, and thought it an insufferable thing for a Roman proconsul to pay toll to such a crew of Barbarians. But he made light of the seeming disgrace, and said time was the thing he purchased, than which nothing in the world could be more precious to a man engaged in great attempts. He therefore satisfied the demands of the mountaineers, and passed over into Spain without losing a moment.—PLUTARCH'S SERTORIUS.

5618. TIME saved. *Washington. General Henry Lee once observed to the chief: "We are amazed, sir, at the vast amount of work that you accomplish." Washington replied: "Sir, I rise at four o'clock, and a great deal of my work is done while others are asleep." [He retired at nine o'clock.]—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 22.

5619. TIME, Systematized. *Petronius Maximus. The private life of the senator Petronius Maximus was often alleged as a rare example of human felicity. His birth was noble and illustrious, since he descended from the Anician family; his dignity was supported by an adequate patrimony in land and money; and these advantages of fortune were accompanied with liberal arts and decent manners, which adorn or imitate the inestimable gifts of genius and virtue. The luxury of his palace and table was hospitable and elegant. Whenever Maximus appeared in public he was surrounded by a train of grateful and obsequious clients; and it is possible that among these clients he might deserve and possess some real friends. His merit was rewarded by the favor of the prince and senate; he thrice exercised the office of Prætorian præfect of Italy; he was twice invested with the consulship, and he obtained the rank of patrician. These civil honors were not incompatible with the enjoyment of leisure and tranquillity; his hours, according to the demands of pleasure or reason, were accurately distributed by a water-clock; and this avarice of time may be allowed to prove the sense which Maximus entertained of his own happiness.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 36, p. 460.

5620. TIMES, Unfavorable. *Eighteenth Century. One of the grand difficulties in a history of Frederick is, all along, this same, that he lived in a century which has no history, and can have little or none. A century so opulent in accumulated falsities—sad opulence descending on it by inheritance, always at compound interest, and always largely increased by fresh acquirement on such immensity of standing capital—opulent in that bad way as never century before was! Which had no longer the consciousness of being false, so false had it grown; and was so steeped in falsity, and impregnated with it to the very bone, that, in fact, the measure of the thing was full, and a French Revolution had to end it. To maintain much veracity in such an element, especially for a king, was no doubt doubly remarkable. But now, How extricate the man from his century? How show the man, who is a reality worthy of being seen, and yet keep his century, as a hypocrisy worthy of being hidden and forgotten, in the due abeyance? To resuscitate the eighteenth century, or call into men's view, beyond what is necessary, the poor and sordid personages and transactions of an epoch so related to us, can be no purpose of mine on this occasion. The eighteenth century, it is well known, does not figure to me as a lovely one, needing to be kept in mind, or spoken of unnecessarily. To me the eighteenth century has nothing grand in it, except that grand universal suicide, named French Revolution, by which it terminated its otherwise most worthless existence with at least one worthy act—setting fire to its old home and self, and going up in flames and volcanic explosions in a truly memorable and important manner. A very fit termination, as I thankfully feel, for such a century.—CARLYLE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, Book 1, ch. 1, p. 7.

5621. TIMIDITY in Government. *Constantine. The same timid policy, of dividing whatever is united, of reducing whatever is eminent, of dreading every active power, and of expecting that the most feeble will prove the most obedient, seems to pervade the institutions of several princes, and particularly those of Constantine.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 17, p. 12.

5623. TITLE, Indifference to. *Napoleon I. [On his way to St. Helena.] The orders given by the [British] Government . . . were very explicit, that Napoleon should not be recognized as emperor, but simply as general. . . . When informed of the decree, he simply remarked, "They cannot prevent me from being myself."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 29.

5624. TITLE, Nominal. *France and England. The first and greatest cause of the [French and Indian war] was the conflicting territorial claims of the two nations. England had colonized the sea-coast; France had colonized the interior of the continent. In making grants of territory, the English kings had always proceeded upon the theory that the voyage of Sebastian Cabot had given to England a lawful right to the country from one ocean to the other.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 30, p. 247.

5625. TITLE, A papal. Africa. The enthusiasm of Prince Henry was redoubled by the success of these experiments, and he resolved to employ the operation of a new and very powerful motive to the prosecution of his schemes of discovery. He applied to the Pope, Eugene IV., and representing that the chief object of his pious wishes was to spread the knowledge of the Christian religion among those barbarous and idolatrous nations which occupied the greatest part of the continent of Africa, he procured a bull, conferring on the Portuguese an exclusive right to all the countries which they had discovered, or might discover, between Cape Non and the continent of India. Ridiculous as such a donation appears to us, it was never doubted at that time that the pope had a right to confer it, and, what is very singular, all the European powers, for a considerable space of time, paid the most implicit deference to the grant, and acknowledged the exclusive title of the Portuguese to almost the whole continent of Africa.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 18, p. 268.

5626. TITLE, Terrible. "Scourge of God." It was during the retreat from Orleans that a Christian hermit is reported to have approached the Hunnish king, and said to him, "Thou art the Scourge of God for the chastisement of the Christians." Attila instantly assumed this new title of terror, which thenceforth became the appellation by which he was most widely and most fearfully known.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 248.

5627. TITLE by the Sword. Scottish Barons. Edward I., having forfeited the estates of many of the Scottish barons, granted them to his English subjects. These were expelled by the Scots, who seized their lands. Amid such frequent changes, many held their possessions by titles extremely defective, and Robert formed on this ground a scheme for checking the growing power and wealth of his nobles. He summoned them to appear, and show by what rights they held their lands. "By this right," said each of them, laying his hand upon his sword; "by the sword we gained them, and by that we will defend them." Robert, apprehensive of the consequences of exasperating this resolute spirit of his nobles, wisely dropped the scheme.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 230.

5628. TITLES, Pompous. Romans. [During the reign of Constantine] the principal officers of the empire were saluted, even by the sovereign himself, with the deceitful titles of your Sincerity, your Gravity, your Excellency, your Eminence, your Sublime and wonderful Magnitude, your Illustrious and magnificent Highness.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 108.

5629. TITLES, Sale of. James II. [Sir Antony Shirley invented a wholesale mode of obtaining supplies for King James I., by the sale of honors. One hundred thousand pounds were obtained by the sale of baronets. A title intermediate between a knight and a baron was bestowed at the price of £1095.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 22, p. 355.

5630. TITLES, Significant. State. [The Arab rulers gave to some of their servants the title of Pasha, which was derived from two Persian words, pai and schah, which signify foot of the Shah.] This Asiatic denomination goes back to Cyrus. He gave, by extension of his authority, to his principal officers the name of one of the members of his person. The administrators were his eyes; the tax-collectors his hands; the police his ears; the judges his tongue; the governors, the viziers, the visitors of the provinces, his feet or his pashas.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 235.

5631. TITLES, Strange. Army. [The Janissaries, a fanatical band of Islamites,] placed between the cap and the turban a wooden spoon instead of a buckle—thus glorifying themselves, in presence of the volunteer and unpaid troops, at their distinction of being paid and fed too by the Emir. They gave to all the grades of their privileged corps titles relative to the subsistence of the troops in the campaign. The colonel received the name of grand distributor of soup; the superior and subaltern officers were called, the one head cook, the other first water-carrier. Next to the standard of this band, which bore, embroidered in wool, the crescent and the double-pointed sabre, the cooking pot became the sacred symbol of confraternity with the Janissaries, their sign for rallying for council, and more often for sedition.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 212.

5632. TITLES, Superfluous. William Pitt. In ceasing to be the great Commoner [to become a member of the House of Lords as Earl of Chatham] he veiled his superiority. "My friend," said Frederick of Prussia on hearing of it, "has harmed himself by accepting a peerage." "It argues," said the King of Poland, "a senselessness to glory to forfeit the name of Pitt for any title." . . . His popularity vanished, and with it the terror of his name.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 26.

5633. TITLES, Undeserved. Degrees. Vicesimus Knox, . . . a distinguished fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, a Master of Arts, describes . . . the most absurd forms of ease and credit as the finest genius, in one stage of the process; and in another, when "the examiners and the candidates often converse on the last drinking bout, or read the newspaper, or a novel, or divert themselves as well as they can in any manner, till the clock strikes eleven, when all parties descend, and the testimonium is signed by the masters." So much for the Bachelor's degree, which is attained after four years' term-keeping. For the degree of Master of Arts three more years must be employed in trumpery formalities; and then, "after again taking oaths by wholesale, and paying the fees," the academic issues into the world with an "undeniable passport to carry him through it with credit."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 111.

5634. TOBACCO opposed. James I. [King James I. wrote a treatise entitled a "Counterblast to Tobacco." He hated tobacco-smokers, but did not check the increase of the fashionable indulgence.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 22, p. 340.

5635. TOIL, Contentment in. Abdolonymus. He was so poor that he was obliged to get his bread by day labor in a garden without the city. His honesty and integrity had reduced him, as well as many more, to such extreme poverty. Solely intent upon his labor, he did not hear the clashing of the arms which had shaken all Asia. [Being of royal blood, Alexander made him king of the Sidonians]. . . . Alexander commanded the newly elected prince to be sent for, and after surveying him attentively a long time, spoke thus: "Thy air and mien do not contradict what is related of thy extraction; but I should be glad to know with what frame of mind thou didst bear thy poverty." "Would to the gods," replied he, "that I may bear this crown with equal fortitude! These hands have procured me all I desired; and while I possessed nothing, I wanted nothing." This answer gave Alexander a high idea of Abdolonymus' virtue, so that he presented him not only with all the rich furniture which had belonged to Strato, but with part of the Persian plunder, and likewise annexed one of the neighboring provinces to his dominions.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 6.

5636. TOIL, Rewards of. Cyrus. "Everything charms and transports me in this place," said Lysander, addressing himself to Cyrus; "but what strikes me most is the exquisite taste and elegant industry of the person who drew the plan of the several parts of this garden, and gave it the fine order, wonderful disposition, and happiness of symmetry, which I cannot sufficiently admire." Cyrus, infinitely pleased with this discourse, replied, "It was I that drew the plan, and entirely marked it out; and many of the trees which you see were planted with my own hands." "What!" replied Lysander, considering him from head to foot, "is it possible, with these purple robes and splendid vestments, those strings of jewels and bracelets of gold, those buskins so richly embroidered, that you could play the gardener, and employ your royal hands in planting trees?" "Does that surprise you?" said Cyrus. "I swear by the god Mithras, that when my health admits I never sit down to table without having made myself sweat with some fatigue or other, either in military exercise, rural labor, or some other toilsome employment, to which I apply with pleasure and without sparing myself." Lysander was amazed at this discourse, and pressing him by the hand—"Cyrus," said he, "you are truly happy, and deserve your high fortune."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 1.

5637. TOLERANCE, Impracticable. Religious. Mr. Hallam has truly said, "Tolerance in religion, it is well known, so unanimously admitted (at least verbally), even by the theologians in the present century, was seldom considered as practicable, much less as a matter of right during the period of the Reformation."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 3, p. 39.

5638. TOLERATION, Apostle of. Roger Williams. To this man belongs the shining honor of being first in America or in Europe to proclaim the full gospel of religious toleration. He declared to his people that the conscience of man may in no wise be bound by the authority of the magistrate; that civil government has only to do with civil matters, such as the collection of taxes, the restraint and punishment of crime, and the protection of all men in the enjoyment of equal rights. For these noble utterances he was obliged to quit the ministry of the church at Salem and retire to Plymouth. Finally, in 1634, he wrote a paper in which the declaration was made that grants of land, though given by the king of England, were invalid until the natives were justly recompensed. This was equivalent to saying that the colonial charter itself was void, and the people were really living upon the land of the Indians. Great excitement was occasioned by the publication, and Williams consented that, for the sake of public peace, the paper should be burned. But he continued to teach his doctrines, saying that compulsory attendance at religious worship, as well as toleration for the support of the ministry, was contrary to the teachings of the gospel. When arraigned for these bad doctrines, he crowned his offences by telling the court that a test of church-membership in a voter or a public officer was as ridiculous as the selection of a doctor of physic or the pilot of a ship on account of his skill in theology. These assertions raised such a storm in court that Williams was condemned for heresy and banished from the colony. In the dead of winter he left home, and became an exile in the desolate forest. For fourteen weeks he wandered on through the snow, sleeping at night on the ground or in a hollow tree, living on parched corn, acorns, and roots. He carried with him one precious treasure, a private letter from Governor Winthrop, giving him words of cheer and encouragement. . . . With five companions who had joined him in banishment, he embarked in a canoe, passed down the river, and crossed to the west side of the bay. Here he was safe; his enemies could hunt him no farther. A tract of land was honorably purchased from Canonius; and in June of 1636 the illustrious founder of Rhode Island laid out the city of Providence.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13, p. 128.

5639. TOLERATION commended. Cromwell. Cromwell's whole ideas of religious liberty rose and ranged far beyond those of most of the men of his age. How impressively this comes out in his correspondence with the Scotch commissioners and Presbyterian clergymen after the battle of Dunbar! "You say," he writes, "that you have just cause to regret that men of civil employments should usurp the calling and employment of the ministry to the scandal of the Reformed kirk. Are you troubled that Christ is preached? Is preaching so exclusively your function? I thought the Covenant and these professors of it could have been willing that any should speak good of the name of Christ; if not, it is no covenant of God's approving; nor are these kirk's you mention in so much the spouse of Christ. Where do you find in the Scripture a ground to warrant such an assertion that preaching is exclusively your function?"—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 5, p. 193.

5640. TOLERATION condemned. By Puritans. The treatise of Thomas Edwards, . . . in his "Gangrena" [published in time of Cromwell, and disapproved by him, says:] "A toleration is the grand design of the devil—his masterpiece, and chief engine he has at this time, to uphold his tottering kingdom. It is the most compendious, ready, sure way to destroy all religion, lay all waste, and bring in all evil. It is a most transcendent, catholic, and fundamental evil for this kingdom of any that can be imagined. As original sin is the most fundamental sin, having the seed and spawn of all in it, so a toleration hath all errors in it, and all evils. It is against the whole stream and current of Scripture, both in the Old and New Testament, both in matters of faith and manners, both general and particular commands. It overthrows all relations, political, ecclesiastical, and economical. And whereas other evils, whether of judgment or practice, be but against some one or two places of Scripture, or relation, this is against all—this is the Abaddon, Apollyon, the destroyer of all religion, the abomination of all desolation and astonishment, the liberty of perdition, and therefore the devil follows it night and day, working mightily in many by writing books for it, and other ways—all the devils in hell and their instruments being at work to promote a toleration.”—HOOD’S CROMWELL, ch. 5, p. 192.

5641. TOLERATION, Edict of. *First in France. An edict was published at St. Germain in January, 1562, by which permission was given to the Huguenots throughout the kingdom to hold meetings for religious worship outside the walls of towns, and all penalties enacted against them were abolished. They were required, on the other hand, to restore to the dominant communion all churches of which they had wrongfully taken possession; to abstain from preaching against the Catholic faith; and to leave the clergy in peaceable enjoyment of their tithes and other endowments. This was the first official recognition of the principle of religious toleration in France.—STUDENTS’ FRANCE, ch. 16, § 4.

5642. TOLERATION forgotten. *Puritans. The Puritan and republican party in Maryland had grown sufficiently strong to defy the proprietor and Catholics. A Protestant assembly was convened at Patuxent in October of 1654. The first act was to acknowledge the supremacy of Cromwell; the next to disfranchise the Catholics and to deprive them of the protection of the laws. The ungrateful representatives seemed to forget that if Lord Baltimore had been equally intolerant not one of them would have had even a residence within the limits of Maryland. It would be difficult to find a more odious piece of legislation than that of the assembly at Patuxent. Of course the Catholic party would not submit to a code by which they were virtually banished from their own province. Civil war ensued. Governor Stone organized and armed the militia, seized the records of the colony, and marched against the opposing forces. A decisive battle was fought just across the estuary from the present site of Annapolis. The Catholics were defeated, with a loss of fifty men in killed and wounded. Stone himself was taken prisoner, and was only saved from death by the personal friendship of some of the insurgents. Three of the Catholic leaders were tried by a court-martial, and executed.—RIDPATH’S U. S., ch. 26, p. 232.

5643. TOLERATION, Partiality in. *Cromwell. We wonder at some things in Cromwell’s history. We wonder that in his after years, while his soul was so blessed by a large toleration, he so resolutely and intolerantly hated Romanism. We must remember, as we have already said, that when Oliver was six years old there came to his father’s house in Huntingdon the news of the Gunpowder Plot; we must remember that a feline Jesuitism was sneaking over the whole of England, and round the courts of Europe and through its kingdoms; we must remember that when he was only eleven years old the brave Henry of Navarre was murdered in the streets of Paris—fine defender of Protestantism that he was! Pieces of news like these were calculated to sting a boy’s memory, and to remain there, and to leave a perpetual irritation. Popery was to be hated then; we now may afford to forgive what Popery has done.—HOOD’S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 33.

5644. TOLERATION, Popular. *Oliver Cromwell. [He was very bitter against priests, and would not have the mass, but he says:] As for the people, what thoughts have they in matters of religion, in their own breasts, I cannot reach; but shall think it my duty, if they walk honestly and peaceably, not to cause them in the least to suffer for the same; and shall endeavor to walk patiently and in love toward them, to see if it shall please God to give them another or a better mind.—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 9, p. 126.

5645. TOLERATION, Remarkable. *Timour. One circumstance which strongly marks a greatness of character in this Tartar potentate was his toleration. He believed himself neither in the sect of the Lama nor in the faith of Mahomet, but acknowledged one Supreme Being, without any mixture of superstitious observances; yet he suffered all men, both Mussulmans and idolaters, to exercise their own religious worship; and while he was passing Mount Libanus, he is said to have even assisted, with reverence, at the religious ceremonies of some of the Christian anchorites who dwelt on that mountain.—TYTLER’S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13, p. 208.

5646. TOMB of Pleasure-seeker. *Sardanapalus. [Alexander came to Anchiala, built by Sardanapalus.] His tomb was still to be seen in that city, with this inscription: “Sardanapalus built Anchiala and Tarsus in one day: GO, PASSENGER, EAT, DRINK, AND REJOICE, FOR THE REST IS NOTHING.”—ROLLIN’S HIST., Book 15, § 5.

5647. TOMBS, Empty. *Pyramids. These pyramids were tombs; and there is still to be seen in the middle of the largest an empty sepulchre, cut of one entire stone, about three feet deep and broad, and a little above six feet long. Thus all this bustle, all this expense, and all the labors of so many thousand men for so many years ended in procuring for a prince, in this vast and almost boundless pile of building, a little vault six feet in length. Besides, the kings who built these pyramids had it not in their power to be buried in them, and so did not enjoy the sepulchre they had built. The public hatred which they incurred, by reason of their unheard-of cruelties to their subjects, in laying such heavy tasks upon them, occasioned their being interred in some obscure place, to prevent their bodies from being exposed to the fury and vengeance of the populace.—ROLLIN’S HIST., Book 1, ch. 2, § 2.

5648. TORTURE of Criminals. *France. [Louis XV. was stabbed with a penknife in the hand by a crazy fanatic named] Damiens, who declared that his purpose was to punish the king for his tyrannical treatment of the Parliament, and to force him to take measures for preventing the refusal of the sacraments. After being cruelly tortured, the wretched criminal was executed with all the frightful barbarities which the law denounced on parricides: his limbs were torn with red-hot pincers, and boiling melted lead was poured into the wounds; after which his body was dragged in pieces by four horses, and the remains burnt and scattered to the winds.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 24, § 2.

5649. TORTURE, Punishment by. Iron Boot. [It was a boot of iron put on the leg, and wedges were driven in, commonly against the calf, but sometimes on the shin-bone. Officers of the English Government used it to punish disloyal or suspected Scotchmen in Edinburgh.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 17, p. 294.

5650. TORTURE, Terrible. Garibaldi. He became involved in one of those wars between Republicans and Absolutists which desolated the countries of South America for so many years. He fought on sea and on land. He was wounded and shipwrecked. He commanded fleets and regiments. He was victorious and defeated. Once, being taken a prisoner, he was cruelly beaten with a club, then hung by his hands to a beam for two hours, and when cut down fell helpless to the earth.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 495.

5651. TORTURE, Testimony by. John Howard. In all the prisons of the Continent he found one horror which was unknown in England—a torture chamber. It was a custom then, in all the countries of Europe, except Prussia, to subject criminals to the torture, in order to compel them to confess their crimes and reveal their accomplices. This chamber was usually underground, that the cries of the sufferer might not be heard. Clad only in a long flannel gown, the trembling victim was led to this apartment, where were assembled the magistrates, the executioners, a surgeon, and a secretary; and there he was tortured till his agony had wrung from him a confession, real or fictitious. Sometimes it was the thumb-screw, sometimes the boot, sometimes a chair with blunt spikes in the seat; sometimes it was a machine for dislocating the arms; sometimes it was the lash or the shower-bath, that tried the endurance of the accused. These chambers of torture Howard visited, but he purposely forebore to lend a false attraction to his book by describing them.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 50.

5652. TRACTS effective. Religious. [Dr. Coke, in 1785, gave a tract, being an extract of Mr. Law's "Treatise on the Nature and Design of Christianity," to a family named Cowles, in Williamsburgh, Va.] By means of it they were so stirred up to seek the Lord, that the father, the mother, and six children, who were married, with their husbands and wives—fourteen in all—were converted. The man who received the tract became a preacher.—STEVENS' M. E. CHURCH, vol. 2, p. 287.

5653. TRADE, Contempt for. Samuel Johnson. Being solicited to compose a funeral sermon for the daughter of a tradesman, he naturally inquired into the character of the deceased; and being told she was remarkable for her humility and condescension to inferiors, he observed that those were very laudable qualities, but it might not be so easy to discover who the lady's inferiors were.—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 175.

5654. TRADE, Illicit. American Colonies. A.D. 1763. It was thought that of a million and a half pounds of tea consumed annually in the colonies, not more than one-tenth part was sent from England. Grenville [prime-minister] held that the contraband was all stolen from the commerce and part of it from the manufactures of Great Britain, against . . . the law.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 9.

5655. TRADE, Inhuman. Slave Trade. By the treaty of Utrecht England gained the monopoly of the slave trade in Spanish and British America. Controlling the trade in slaves, who cost nothing but trinkets and toys and refuse arms, England gained, by the sale of the children of Africa into bondage in America, the capital which built up and confirmed a British empire in Hindostan.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

5656. TRADE, Laws for. England. [In 1509] the complaint of the Commons, that hat-makers and cap-makers "sell their hats and caps at an outrageous price," averring that what they buy for sixteen-pence they sell for three shillings, is simply evidence of lack of competition. [It was enacted that no hatter should sell the best hat above the price of twenty-pence. But the purchaser really obtained no cheaper commodity; he lost in quality what he gained in price.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 251.

5657. TRADE, Overreaching in. Egyptians. The general character of the Egyptians, with respect to morals, contributed likewise to draw upon them the disesteem of other nations. They have been generally accused by the ancients of great cunning and insincerity in their dealings. The term Avvovρατειν, to play the Egyptian, was proverbially used by the Greeks to signify cozening and overreaching.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 4, p. 47.

5658. TRADE regulated. Fixed Prices. An edict was issued in the name of the four Cæsars—Diocletian, Maximian, Constantius, and Galerius. It fixed a maximum of prices throughout the empire for all the necessities and commodities of life. The preamble insists, with great vehemence, on the extortion and inhumanity of the venders and merchants. . . . The edict, as Colonel Leake clearly shows, was issued A.C. 303. Among the articles of which the maximum value is assessed are oil, salt, honey, butchers' meat, poultry, game, fish, vegetables, fruit, the wages of laborers and artisans, schoolmasters and orators, and clothes.—MILMAN'S NOTE IN GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 410.

5659. ———. Roman Emperor Julian. When the luxurious citizens of Antioch complained of the high price of poultry and fish, Julian publicly declared that a frugal city ought to be satisfied with a regular supply of wine, oil, and bread. . . . The emperor ventured on a very dangerous and doubtful step, of fixing, by legal authority, the value of corn. He enacted that, in a time of scarcity, it should be sold at a price which had seldom been known in the most plentiful years. . . . The consequences might have been foreseen, and were soon felt. The Imperial wheat was purchased by the rich merchants; the proprietors of land, or of corn, withheld from the city the accustomed supply, and the small quantities that appeared in the market were secretly sold at an advanced and illegal price. Julian still continued to applaud his own policy, and treated the complaints of the people as a vain and ungrateful murmur.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 24, p. 466.

5660. ———. England. [In 1548 the] sellers of victuals were to be punished for conspiring and covenanting to sell their commodities at unreasonable prices. It required three quarters of a century to show that such legislation was a mistake.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 185.

5661. TRADE, Tricks in. England in 1547. [The dealer puts] a strike of good malt in the bottom of the sack, two strikes of bad malt in the middle, and a good strike in the sack's mouth; the cloth-maker stretches his eighteen yards of cloth to twenty-seven, and then thickens it with "flock powder," the "devil's dust" of modern times.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 29, p. 486.

5662. TRADES-UNION, Objection to. Caste. In the towns the organization of trades, with their strict laws of apprenticeship and their guilds, excluded from competition with the recognized artisan all those who had not the claim of caste—for caste it was, when a workman must have been brought up to a calling, and could follow that calling and no other.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 17, p. 267.

5663. TRADES-UNION, Opposition of. James Watt. Although there were no mathematical-instrument-makers in Glasgow [where he first established himself in business], he was opposed by the corporation of the hammermen, on the ground that he was neither the son of a burgher nor had served an apprenticeship within the borough.—SMILES' BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES, p. 13.

5664. TRADES-UNION, Oppressive. James Watt. [When James Watt went to Glasgow to establish a shop for the manufacture of mathematical instruments,] the worshipful company of hammermen, in that spirit of exclusiveness which the lapse of a century has scarcely eradicated where guilds and corporations have any remnant of antiquated privileges, resolved to prevent James Watt exercising his art.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 3, p. 59.

5665. TRADES-UNION prohibited. England. [It was enacted in 1423,] Whereas by the yearly congregations and confederacies made by the masons in their general chapters assembled, the good course and effect of the statutes of laborers be openly violated and broken, in subversion of the law, and to the great damage of all the commons, our said lord, the king, willing in this case to provide remedy, hath ordained and established that such chapters and congregations shall not be hereafter holden; and if any such be made, they that cause such chapters to be assembled and holden, if they therefore be convicted, shall be judged for felons. And all the other masons that come to such chapters and congregations be punished by imprisonment of their bodies, and make fine and reason at the king's will.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 116.

5666. ———. England. [In 1548] combinations of workmen were prohibited under severe penalties.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 185.

5667. TRADITION, Worthless. Cromwell. [Charles I. fled at the battle of Dunbar.] They still remember that day in Worcester, and still point out many of the places connected with the story of the battle; and in Perry Wood, where Cromwell first took up his position, there is a tree, which the peasant shows to those who desire to see it, where the devil, Cromwell's intimate friend, appeared to him, and gave him the promise of victory.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 13, p. 170.

5668. TRAINING for Greatness. Alexander. So ripe a judgment in this young prince was owing as much to the good education which had been given him as to the excellence of his natural abilities. Several preceptors were appointed to teach him whatsoever was worthy the heir to a great kingdom; and the chief of these was Leonidas, a relation of the queen, and a person of the most severe morals. Alexander himself related afterward, that this Leonidas, in their journeys together, used frequently to look into the trunks where his bed and clothes were laid, in order to see if Olympias, his mother, had not put something superfluous into them, which might administer to delicacy and luxury.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 1.

5669. TRAINING, Lack of. Military. It is the misfortune of men of superior military ability that their subordinates are generally failures when trusted with independent commands. Accustomed to obey implicitly the instructions of their chief, they have done what they have been told to do, and their virtue has been in never thinking for themselves. They succeed, and they forget why they succeed, and in part attribute their fortune to their own skill. With Alexander's generals, with Cæsar's, with Cromwell's, even with some of Napoleon's, the story has been the same. They have been self-confident, yet when thrown upon their own resources they have driven back upon a judgment which has been inadequately trained. The mind which guided them is absent. The instrument is called on to become self-acting, and necessarily acts unwisely.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 25.

5670. TRAINING, Lasting. Scott's Mother. Sir Walter's mother, who was a Miss Rutherford, the daughter of a physician, had been better educated than most Scotchwomen of her day, in spite of having been sent "to be finished off" by "the honorable Mrs. Ogilvie," whose training was so effective, in one direction at least, that even in her eightieth year Mrs. Scott could not enjoy a comfortable rest in her chair, but "took as much care to avoid touching her chair with her back as if she had still been under the stern eyes of Mrs. Ogilvie."—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT, ch. 1.

5671. TRAINING by Obedience. Spartans. They accustomed the children from their earliest infancy to an entire submission to the laws, magistrates, and all in authority; and their education, properly speaking, was no more than an apprenticeship of obedience. It was for this reason that Agesilaus advised Xenophon to send his children to Sparta, as to an excellent school, where they might learn the greatest and most noble of all sciences, to obey and to command, for the one naturally leads on to the other.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 10, ch. 1, § 1.

5672. TRAINING, Physical. Romans. In treating of the system of Roman education, we have taken notice of those exercises of the body to which all the youth of the republic were accustomed from their earliest infancy. By the constant practice of wrestling, boxing, launching the javelin, running, and swimming they were inured from their cradle to that species of life which a soldier leads in the most active campaign in the field. They were accustomed to the military place—that is, to walk twenty miles, and sometimes twenty-four, in four hours. During these marches they carried burdens of sixty pounds' weight; and the weapons with which they were armed were double the weight of those which were used in the actual field of battle.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 5, p. 452.

5673. TRAINING, Success without. William Prince of Orange. The faculties which are necessary for the conduct of great affairs ripened in him at a time of life when they have scarcely begun to blossom in ordinary men. Since Octavius the world had seen no such instance of precocious statesmanship. Skilful diplomatists were surprised to hear the weighty observations which at seventeen the prince made on public affairs, and still more surprised to see the lad, in situations in which he might have been expected to betray strong passion, preserve a composure as imperturbable as their own. At eighteen he sat among the fathers of the Commonwealth, grave, discreet, and judicious as the oldest among them. At twenty-one, in a day of gloom and terror, he was placed at the head of the administration. At twenty-three he was renowned throughout Europe as a soldier and a politician. He had put domestic factions under his feet; he was the soul of a mighty coalition; and he had contended with honor in the field against some of the greatest generals of the age.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 153.

5674. TRAITOR, Political. Mr. Huske in Parliament. A.D. 1763. A native of New Hampshire, educated at Boston, now member [of Parliament] from Malden, . . . boasted that taxes might be laid on the colonies to yield £5,000,000 [only £200,100 were proposed by the ministry], which would secure the promised relief to the country gentlemen. This sum, he insisted, the Americans were well able to pay; and he was heard by the House with great joy and attention, betraying his native land for the momentary pleasure of being cheered by the aristocracy, which was so soon to laugh at him.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 9.

5675. TRAITOR punished. By Mother. The great Pausanias, who had beaten the Persians in the battle of Platæa, and who on many occasions had behaved with great generosity as well as moderation, at last degenerated and fell into a scandalous treaty with the Persians, in hopes, through their interest, to make himself sovereign of Greece. As soon as he had conceived these strange notions, he fell into the manners of the Persians, affected all their luxury, and derided the plain customs of his country, of which he had formerly been so fond. The Ephori waited some time for clear proof of his treacherous designs, and when they had obtained it, determined to imprison him. But he fled into the temple of Minerva Chalcoïcos, and they besieged him there. They walled up all the gates, and his own mother laid the first stone. When they had almost starved him to death, they laid hands on him, and by the time they had got him out of the temple he expired.—NOTE IN PLUTARCH'S LIVES.

5676. TRAITOR, Shameless. Reign of James II. [Lord Sunderland, the prime-minister, was apprehensive of retribution when the revolution should take place.] There was yet one way in which he might escape—a way more terrible to a noble spirit than a prison or a scaffold. He might still, by a well-timed and useful treason, earn his pardon from the foes of the government. It was in his power to render to them at this conjuncture services beyond all price; for he had the royal ear; he had great influence over the Jesuitical cabal; and he was blindly trusted by the French ambassador. . . . Whenever he wished to transmit a secret message to Holland, he spoke to his wife; she wrote to Sidney, and Sidney communicated her letter to William. One of her communications was intercepted and carried to James. She vehemently protested that it was a forgery. Her husband, with characteristic ingenuity, defended himself by representing that it was quite impossible for any man to be so base as to do what he was in the habit of doing. "Even if this is Lady Sunderland's hand," he said, "that is no affair of mine. Your Majesty knows my domestic misfortunes. The footing on which my wife and Mr. Sidney are is but too public. Who can believe that I would make a confidant of the man who has injured my honor in the tenderest point—of the man whom, of all others, I ought most to hate?" This defence was thought satisfactory; and secret intelligence was still transmitted from the wittol to the adulteress, from the adulteress to the gallant, and from the gallant to the enemies of James.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 411.

5677. TRAMPS, Philosophic. Cynics. The morality of Socrates . . . was pushed the length of extravagance by the Cynics. The founder of this sect was Antisthenes, a pupil of Socrates. . . . To evince his contempt of luxury, he chose to wear an old and tattered cloak. "Why so ostentatious?" said Socrates. "Through your ragged coat I see your vanity." Virtue, in the opinion of the Cynics, consisted in renouncing all the conveniences and comforts of life. They clothed themselves in rags, disdained to live in a house, slept in the streets, ate nothing but what was coarse and insipid, and wandered about the country with a stick and a knapsack. They derided all the arts as either useless or dangerous. Science was altogether fruitless and unnecessary; for a virtuous man had attained to the perfection of his nature, and had no need to learn anything. From voluntary ignorance they advanced to impudence; and having nothing to lose, while they scorned all gain, they indulged themselves in satire and invective without restraint. . . . The vices with which Diogenes has been reproached are hardly to be believed, when we know that some of the most virtuous of the Greeks were his admirers and disciples.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 269.

5678. TRANCE, Continuous. Swedenborg. A short time before his death he lay for some weeks in a trance, without any sustenance.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 28, p. 260.

5679. TRANCES, Punished for. Elizabeth Barton. [Elizabeth Barton, the nun of Kent, claimed to have been miraculously restored to health. She had been long sick, and could not eat or drink by a long space, and in the violence of her infirmity she seemed to be in trances.] and spoke and uttered many foolish and idle words. [She commenced, about 1525, to have] trances and revelations. She had revelations and special knowledge concerning Cardinal Wolsey, and also the king's highness, concerning his marriage, so that she said if he did marry another woman his grace should not reign king past one month afterward. . . . She saw the king, Anne Boleyn, and the Earl of Wiltshire walking in a garden; and a little devil whispering in the lady's ear to send her father with a great bribe to the emperor. She saw evil spirits struggling for Wolsey's soul after his decease. She saw persons whom the angel of God had appointed to be at her death when she should receive the crown of martyrdom. [She was executed for conspiracy of treason, and involved Bishop Fisher and Sir Thomas More in a similar fate.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 22, p. 352.

5680. TRAVEL, Benefits of. Crusaders. The contempt with which, in the last century, it was fashionable to speak of the pilgrimages, the sanctuaries, the crusades, and the monastic institutions of the Middle Ages. In times when men were scarcely ever induced to travel by liberal curiosity, or the pursuit of gain, it was better that the rude inhabitant of the north should visit Italy and the east as a pilgrim, than that he should never see anything but those squalid cabins and uncleared woods among which he was born.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 7.

5681. TRAVEL, Dangers of. Swedenborg. In the year 1710 I set out for Gottenburg, that I might be conveyed, by ship, thence to London. On the voyage my life was in danger four times: first on some shoals, toward which we were driven by a storm, until we were within a quarter of a mile from the raging breakers, and we thought we should all perish. Afterward we narrowly escaped some Danish pirates under French colors; and the next evening we were fired into from a British ship, which mistook us for the same pirates, but without much damage. Lastly, in London itself, I was exposed to a more serious danger. While we were entering the harbor, some of our countrymen came to us in a boat, and persuaded me to go with them into the city. Now, it was known in London that an epidemic was raging in Sweden, and therefore all who arrived from Sweden were forbidden to leave their ships for six weeks, or forty days; so I, having transgressed this law, was very near being hanged, and was only freed under the condition that, if any one attempted the same thing again, he should not escape the gallows.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 11, p. 26.

5682. TRAVEL, Difficulties of. Reign of Charles II. The rich commonly travelled in their own carriages, with at least four horses. . . . A coach and six is in our time never seen, except as part of some pageant. The frequent mention, therefore, of such equipages in old books is likely to mislead us. We attribute to magnificence what was really the effect of a very disagreeable necessity. People in the time of Charles II. travelled with six horses, because with a smaller number there was great danger of sticking fast in the mire. Nor were even six horses always sufficient.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 351.

5683. TRAVEL, Effects of. Emulation. The Russian traders had seen the magnificence and tasted the luxury of the city of the Cæsars. A marvellous tale and a scanty supply excited the desires of their savage countrymen; they envied the gifts of nature which their climate denied; they coveted the works of art which they were too lazy to imitate and too indigent to purchase; the Varangian princes unfurled the banners of piratical adventure, and their bravest soldiers were drawn from the nations that dwelt in the northern isles of the ocean.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 55, p. 428.

5684. TRAVEL expedited. Romans. Cities were connected with each other and with the capital by the public highways, which, issuing from the forum of Rome, traversed Italy, pervaded the provinces, and were terminated only by the frontiers of the empire. If we carefully trace the distance from the wall of Antoninus to Rome, and from thence to Jerusalem, it will be found that the great chain of communication from the north-west to the south-east point of the empire was drawn out to the length of four thousand and eighty Roman miles. The public roads were accurately divided by mile-stones, and ran in a direct line from one city to another, with very little respect for the obstacles either of nature or private property. Mountains were perforated, and bold arches thrown over the broadest and most rapid streams. The middle part of the road was raised into a terrace which commanded the adjacent country, consisted of several strata of sand, gravel, and cement, and was paved with large stones, or, in some places near the capital, with granite. Such was the solid construction of the Roman highways, whose firmness has not entirely yielded to the effort of fifteen centuries.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 63.

5685. — — — Stage-Coach. To the very beginning of the Revolution the people lived apart, isolated and dependent on their own resources for life and enjoyment. When, in 1766, an express wagon made the trip from New York to Philadelphia in two days, it was considered a marvel of rapidity. Six years later the first stage-coach began to run regularly between Boston and Providence.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 36, p. 283.

5686. TRAVEL, Indifference to. Roman Emperor Antoninus Pius. The tranquil life of Antoninus Pius was spent in the bosom of Italy; and during the twenty-three years that he directed the public administration, the longest journeys of that amiable prince extended no farther than from his palace in Rome to the retirement of his Lanuvian villa.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 9.

5687. TRAVEL, Objects in. To See Men. It will be observed that when giving me advice as to my travels, Dr. [Samuel] Johnson did not dwell upon cities, and palaces, and pictures, and shows, and Arcadian scenes. He was of Lord Essex's opinion, who advises his kinsman, Roger Earl of Rutland, "rather to go a hundred miles to speak with one wise man than five miles to see a fair town."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 119.

5688. TRAVEL, Slow. Stage-Coach. On the 10th of July [1754] Benjamin Franklin laid before the commissioners the draft of a federal constitution. His vast and comprehensive mind had realized the true condition and wants of the country: the critical situation of the colonies demanded a central government. How else could revenues be raised, an army be organized, and the common welfare be provided for? According to the proposed plan of union, Philadelphia, a central city, was to be the capital. It was urged in behalf of this clause that the delegates of New Hampshire and Georgia—the colonies most remote—could reach the seat of government in fifteen or twenty days.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 31, p. 257.

5689. TRAVEL, Suppression of. Reign of Charles II. [Stage-coaches were introduced between Exeter and London.] Many persons were, from mere stupidity and obstinacy, disposed to clamor against the innovation, simply because it was an innovation. It was vehemently argued that this mode of conveyance would be fatal to the breed of horses and to the noble art of horsemanship; that the Thames, which had long been an important nursery of seamen, would cease to be the chief thoroughfare from London up to Windsor and down to Gravesend; that saddlers and spurriers would be ruined by hundreds; that numerous inns, at which mounted travellers had been in the habit of stopping, would be deserted, and would no longer pay any rent; that the new carriages were too hot in summer and too cold in winter; that the passengers were grievously annoyed by invalids and crying children; that the coach sometimes reached the inn so late that it was impossible to get supper, and sometimes started so early that it was impossible to get breakfast. On these grounds it was gravely recommended that no public carriage should be permitted to have more than four horses, to start oftener than once a week, or to go more than thirty miles a day.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 11, p. 353.

5690. TREACHERY, Base. Philip VI. Fifteen of the most powerful barons of Brittany, whom the king had invited to a grand tournament, were suddenly arrested and thrown into the Châtelet, upon a vague charge of intriguing with the English; and after a brief detention they were brought out and beheaded, without any form of trial, on the 29th of November, 1343. Early in the next year three barons of Normandy were in like manner seized and put to death, in utter violation of all rules of justice.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 10, § 7.

5691. TREACHERY, Consummate. Charles II. Charles II. was, perhaps, in a deeper degree than any of his ancestors or descendants, false, treacherous, and licentious. He signed the Solemn League and Covenant of Scotland, supporting the Protestant religion, at the very moment he was in attempted negotiation with Rome for befriending the Papacy. He was, however, proclaimed king of the Scots, and the Scots had a perfect right to elect him to be their monarch; but he aimed at the recovery of Scotland in order to recover the crowns of the three kingdoms. To win Scotland to help him in this, he would not only sign the Covenant; he proffered to sign a declaration by which he renounced all Papacy and Episcopacy. But pledged word or oath were of very little account with him.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 12, p. 149.

5692. TREACHERY, Gold for. Benedict Arnold. About midnight of the 21st [of September André] went ashore from the Vulture, a sloop of war, and met Arnold in a thicket, on the west bank of the river, two miles below Haverstraw. Day-dawn approached, and the conspirators were obliged to hide themselves. In doing so, they entered the American lines. Arnold gave the password, and André, disguising himself, assumed the character of a spy. During the next day the traitor and his victim remained concealed at the house of a Tory named Smith. Here the awful business was completed. Arnold was to surrender West Point, its garrisons and stores, and to receive for his treachery £10,000 and a commission as brigadier in the British army. All preliminaries being settled, papers containing a full description of West Point, its defences, and the best method of attack, were made out and given to André, who secreted the dangerous document in his stockings.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 43, p. 344.

5693. TREACHERY, Message of. Emperor Alexander I. [He professed ardent and lasting friendship for Napoleon, yet when nearly all Europe was arrayed against him he proved to be an enemy.] An Austrian courier was taken prisoner. There was found in his possession a letter from the commander of the Russian forces, addressed to the Archduke Ferdinand, congratulating him upon his victory, and expressing the hope that very soon the Russian army would be permitted to co-operate with the Austrians against the French. Napoleon immediately sent the letter to Alexander, without note or comment.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 7.

5694. TREASON, Cry of. Patrick Henry. [He was a young man and new member of the legislature of Virginia when the Stamp Act was proclaimed.] Lifted beyond himself, "Tarquin," he cried, "and Cæsar had each his Brutus; Charles the First his Cromwell, and George the Third—" "Treason!" shouted the speaker. "Treason, treason!" was echoed round the house, while Henry, fixing his eye on the first interrupter, continued, without faltering, "may profit by their example."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 13.

5695. TREASON defined. Reign of James II. The Tories of the Lower House proceeded to introduce what they called a bill for the preservation of the king's person and government. They proposed that it should be high treason to say that Monmouth was legitimate, to utter any words tending to bring the person or government of the sovereign into hatred or contempt, or to make any motion in Parliament for changing the order of succession. Some of these provisions excited general disgust and alarm. The Whigs, few and weak as they were, attempted to rally, and found themselves re-enforced by a considerable number of moderate and sensible Cavaliers. Words, it was said, may easily be misunderstood by an honest man. They may easily be misconstrued by a knave. What was spoken metaphorically may be apprehended literally. What was spoken ludicrously may be apprehended seriously. A particle, a tense, a mood, an emphasis, may make the whole difference between guilt and innocence.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 540.

5696. TREASON, Incipient. War of 1812. Under a rigorous blockade the foreign commerce of the Eastern States was totally destroyed. The beacons in the light-houses were allowed to burn out, and a general gloom settled over the country. From the beginning many of the people of New England had opposed the war. Their interests centred in ships and factories; the former were captured at sea, and the latter came to a standstill. Industry was paralyzed. The members of the Federal party cried out against the continuance of the contest. The legislature of Massachusetts advised the calling of a convention. The other Eastern States responded to the call, and on the 14th of December [1814] the delegates assembled at Hartford. The objects of the convention were not very clearly expressed, but opposition to the war and the policy of the Administration was the leading principle. The leaders of the Democratic party, who supported the war policy of the government, did not hesitate to say that the purposes of the assembly were disloyal and treasonable. Be that as it may, the convention ruined the Federal party. After remaining in session with closed doors for nearly three weeks, the delegates published an address more moderate and just than had been expected, and then adjourned. But little hope of political preferment remained for those who had participated in the Hartford convention.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 51, p. 412.

5697. TREASON, Punishment of. Romans. This measure of an agrarian law we shall observe, from this time forward, to be a source of domestic dissensions, down to the very end of the commonwealth. Cassius was the first proposer of it, and it cost him his life. His office of consul was no sooner at an end than he was solemnly accused of aspiring at royalty; and, by sentence of the popular assembly, he was thrown from the Tarpeian Rock, the usual punishment of treason.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 4, p. 324.

5698. TREASON, Retribution of. Romans. [When Rome was besieged] Tarpeia, the governor's daughter, charmed with the golden bracelets of the Sabines, betrayed the fort into their hands, and asked, in return for her treason, what they wore on their left arms. Tatius agreeing to the condition, she opened one of the gates by night, and let in the Sabines. . . . Such were the sentiments of Tatius with regard to Tarpeia when he ordered the Sabines to remember their promise, and to grudge her nothing which they had on their left arms. He was the first to take off his bracelet and throw it to her, and with that his shield. As every one did the same, she was overpowered by the gold and shields thrown upon her, and sinking under the weight, expired.—PLUTARCH'S "ROMULUS."

5699. TREASURE, Hope a. Alexander. Before he set out on his expedition [against the Persians] he settled the affairs of Macedon, over which he appointed Antipater as viceroy, with 12,000 foot, and nearly the same number of horse. He also inquired into the domestic affairs of his friends, giving to one an estate in land, to another a village, to a third the revenues of a town, to a fourth the toll of a harbor. And as all the revenues of his demesnes were already employed and exhausted by his donations, Perdicas said to him, "My lord, what is it you reserve for yourself?" Alexander replying, "Hope," "The same hope," says Perdicas, "ought therefore to satisfy us," and very generously refused to accept of what the king had assigned to him.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 3.

5700. TREATY, An observed. William Penn's. The treaty with the red men—the only treaty that was never sworn to and never broken, says Voltaire—was one of friendship and brotherhood and of mutual defence.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 23, p. 379.

5701. TREE, Delivering. Second Crusade. The vanguard, which bore the royal banner and the oriflamme of St. Denys, had doubled their march with rash and inconsiderate speed; and the rear, which the king commanded in person, no longer found their companions in the evening camp. In darkness and disorder they were encompassed, assaulted, and overwhelmed by the innumerable host of Turks, who, in the art of war, were superior to the Christians of the twelfth century. Louis [VII.], who climbed a tree in the general discomfiture, was saved by his own valor and the ignorance of his adversaries; and with the dawn of day he escaped alive, but almost alone, to the camp of the vanguard.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 59, p. 10.

5702. TRIAL abandoned. Scipio Africanus. He incited two of the tribunes, the Petilii, to bring a formal accusation against Scipio Africanus, as guilty of peculation in converting large sums gained in his foreign conquests to his own instead of the public use. The behavior of Scipio on this occasion was consonant to the magnanimity of his character. On the first day of his citation before the assembly of the people, when his accusation was read, appearing not to have listened to it, he entered into an ample detail of all the illustrious services he had rendered his country. His accusers made no reply, not daring to controvert a single word which he had uttered, but contented themselves with adjourning the assembly to the next day. On the morrow, while an immense multitude crowded the forum, Scipio pressed forward to the tribunal, and making a signal for silence, "My countrymen," said he, "it was on this very day that I fought bravely for you against Hannibal and the Carthaginians in the field of Zama, and gained a glorious victory. Is it thus you celebrate that anniversary? Come, let us repair instantly to the capitol, and give our solemn thanks to all the gods for the republic preserved through my means." With one universal acclamation, the whole multitude followed him while he led the way to the temple of Jupiter—and the tribunes were left alone in the forum.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 279.

5703. TRIAL by Combat. Assize of Jerusalem. The trial by battle was established in all criminal cases which affected the life or limb or honor of any person, and in all civil transactions, of or above the value of one mark of silver. It appears that in criminal cases the combat was the privilege of the accuser, who, except in a charge of treason, avenged his personal injury, or the death of those persons whom he had a right to represent; but wherever, from the nature of the charge, testimony could be obtained, it was necessary for him to produce witnesses of the fact. In civil cases the combat was not allowed as the means of establishing the claim of the demandant, but he was obliged to produce witnesses who had, or assumed to have, knowledge of the fact. The combat was then the privilege of the defendant, because he charged the witness with an attempt by perjury to take away his right. He came therefore to be in the same situation as the appellant in criminal cases. It was not then as a mode of proof that the combat was received, nor as making negative evidence (according to the supposition of Montesquieu), but in every case the right to offer battle was founded on the right to pursue by arms the redress of an injury; and the judicial combat was fought on the same principle, and with the same spirit, as a private duel.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 602.

5704. TRIAL by Ordeal. Fire. Under the reign of Justice and Vataces a dispute arose between two officers, one of whom accused the other of maintaining the hereditary right of the Palæologi. . . . He was pursued by the whispers of malevolence; and a subtle courtier, the Archbishop of Philadelphia, urged him to accept the judgment of God in the fiery proof of the ordeal. Three days before the trial the patient's arm was enclosed in a bag, and secured by the royal signet; and it was incumbent on him to bear a red-hot ball of iron three times from the altar to the rails of the sanctuary, without artifice and without injury. Palæologus eluded the dangerous experiment with sense and pleasantry. "I am a soldier," said he, "and will boldly enter the lists with my accusers; but a layman, a sinner like myself, is not endowed with the gift of miracles. Your piety, most holy prelate, may deserve the interposition of Heaven, and from your hands I will receive the fiery globe, the pledge of my innocence." The archbishop started; the emperor smiled; and the absolution or pardon of Michael was approved by new rewards and new services.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 62, p. 147.

5705. TRIAL, Right of. Disregarded. [In 1603 James I. showed both ignorance and despotism in his contempt of the ordinary course of justice.] "I hear our new king," writes Harrington, "hath hanged one man before he was tried; 'tis strangely done; now, if the wind bloweth thus, why may not a man be tried before he hath offended?"—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 20, p. 308.

5706. TRIAL, A severe. John Bunyan. [He was arrested for preaching to Dissenters, and urged to promise to desist.] Remonstrances and entreaties were equally useless, and, with extreme unwillingness, they committed him to Bedford jail to wait for the sessions. . . . To himself, at any rate, his trial was at the moment most severe. He had been left a widower a year or two before, with four young children, one of them blind. He had lately married a second time. His wife was pregnant. The agitation at her husband's arrest brought on premature labor, and she was lying in his house in great danger. He was an affectionate man, and the separation at such a time was peculiarly distressing.—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 5.

5707. TRIALS, Fellowship in. Napoleon I. [His Egyptian army, with immense suffering, crossed the desert from Alexandria to Cairo.] He toiled along on foot at the head of the column, sharing the fatigue of the most humble soldiers. Like them, he threw himself upon the sands at night, with the sand for his pillow, and secreting no luxuries for himself, he ate the coarse beans which constituted the only food for the army.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 11.

5708. TRIALS, Improvement under. Abraham Lincoln. [To a friend] he said cheerfully: "I am very sure that if I do not go away from here a wiser man, I shall go away a better man, for having learned here what a very poor sort of man I am." Afterward, referring to what he called a change of heart, he said he did not remember any precise time when he passed through any special change of purpose or of heart; but he would say that his own election to office and the crisis immediately following influentially determined him in what he called "a process of crystallization then going on in his mind."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 734.

5709. TRIBUTE of Friendship. Melanchthon. Luther is too great, too wonderful for me to depict in words. If there be a man on earth I love with my whole heart, that man is Luther. One is an interpreter, one a logician, another an orator, affluent and beautiful in speech, but Luther is all in all—whatever he writes, whatever he utters, pierces to the soul, fixes itself like arrows in the heart—he is a miracle among men.—REIN'S LUTHER, p. 210.

5710. TRIBUTE scorned. To France. [In 1797 the French Directory grew insolent, and began to demand an alliance against Great Britain, and soon afterward issued instructions to French men-of-war to assail the commerce of the United States, and ordered [Mr. Charles C. Pinckney, the American minister, to leave the territory of France]. These proceedings were equivalent to a declaration of war. The President convened Congress in extraordinary session, and measures were devised for repelling the aggressions of the French. Elbridge Gerry and John Marshall were directed to join Mr. Pinckney in a final effort for a peaceable adjustment of the difficulties. But the effort was fruitless. The Directory of France refused to receive the ambassadors except upon condition that they would pledge the payment into the French treasury of a quarter of a million of dollars. Pinckney answered with the declaration that the United States had millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute. The envoys were then ordered to leave the country.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 47, p. 373.

an annual tribute. In consideration of the tribute, the dey agreed that his pirate ships should confine themselves to the Mediterranean, and should not attack the vessels of such nations as made the payment. Now, however, with the purpose of injuring France, Great Britain winked at the agreement with the dey by which the Algerine sea-robbers were turned loose on the Atlantic. By their depredations American commerce suffered greatly, and the government of the United States was obliged to purchase safety by paying the shameful tribute. —RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 46, p. 370.

5712. TRIBUTE in Women. Tartars. A select band of the fairest maidens of China was annually devoted to the rude embraces of the Huns; and the alliance of the haughty Tanjous [the Tartar princes] was secured by their marriage with the genuine, or adopted, daughters of the Imperial family, which vainly attempted to escape the sacrilegious pollution. The situation of these unhappy victims is described in the verses of a Chinese princess, who laments that she had been condemned by her parents to a distant exile, under a Barbarian husband; who complains that sour milk was her only drink, raw flesh her only food, a tent her only palace; and who expresses, in a strain of pathetic simplicity, the natural wish, that she were transformed into a bird, to fly back to her dear country, the object of her tender and perpetual regret. —GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26, p. 19.

5713. TRICK miscarried, A. Persian. [The Persian satrap] Sarbar still maintained the important station of Chalcedon; but the jealousy of Chosroes or the artifice of Heraclius [both Persian monarchs] soon alienated the mind of that powerful satrap from the service of his king and country. A messenger was intercepted with a real or fictitious mandate to the cadarigan, or second in command, directing him to send, without delay, to the throne the head of a guilty or unfortunate general. The despatches were transmitted to Sarbar himself; and as soon as he read the sentence of his own death, he dexterously inserted the names of four hundred officers, assembled a military council, and asked the cadarigan whether he was prepared to execute the commands of their tyrant. The Persians unanimously declared that Chosroes had forfeited the sceptre; a separate treaty was concluded with the government of Constantinople. —GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 46, p. 478.

5714. TRIFLERS, Diplomatic. French. The American Government held an old claim against France for damages done to the commerce of the United States in the wars of Napoleon. In 1831 the French king had agreed to pay $5,000,000 for the alleged injuries; but the dilatory government of France postponed and neglected the payment, until the President, becoming wrathful, recommended to Congress to make reprisals on French commerce, and at the same time directed the American minister at Paris to demand his passports and come home. These measures had the desired effect, and the indemnity was promptly paid. The government of Portugal was brought to terms in a similar manner. —RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 54, p. 435.

5715. TRIFLES, Effect of. Battle. [A great battle between the Macedonians and the Romans, in which 25,000 of the former were slain, was brought on by Æmilius in this way:] Toward evening he availed himself of an artifice, to make the enemy begin the fight. It seems he turned a horse loose without a bridle, and sent out some Romans to catch him, who were attacked while they were pursuing him, and so the engagement began. —PLUTARCH'S ÆMILIUS.

5716. TRIFLES, Power of. Social Life. Marcus Fabius Ambustus had given one of his daughters in marriage to Licinius Stolo, a plebeian, and the other to Servius Sulpitius, a patrician, and at that time one of the military tribunes. One day, when the wife of the plebeian was at her sister's house, the lictor who walked before Sulpitius, on his return from the senate, knocked loudly at the door with the staff of the fasces, to give notice that the magistrate was coming in. This noise, to which the wife of Licinius was not accustomed, threw her into a panic. Her sister laughed at her alarm, and threw out a malicious jest on the inequality of their conditions. A very small matter, says Livy, is sufficient to disturb the quiet of a woman's mind. The younger Fabia took this affront most seriously to heart. She complained to her father, who, to comfort her, promised that he would do his utmost endeavor that her husband should have his lictor as well as her elder sister's. This trifling circumstance is said to have been the cause of the admission of the plebeian order to the consular dignity. —TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 6, p. 348.

5717. TRIMMER, Political. Lord Halifax. Halifax was known as the Trimmer—one who was selected to tender the crown to William and Mary, but who had taken no part in the first steps which deprived James of the crown. —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 5, p. 68.

5718. TRIUMPH, Fleeting. Napoleon I. [The great campaigns of Bonaparte were productive of triumphs which endured but three months. The allies under Suwaroff reconquered the Cisalpine territory.] —KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 22, p. 382.

5719. TRIUMPH, Honors of. Pompey. When Pompey landed at Brindisi his dreaded legions were disbanded, and he proceeded to the Capitol with a train of captive princes, as the symbols of his victories, and wagons loaded with treasure as an offering to his country. He was received as he advanced with the shouts of applauding multitudes. He entered Rome in a galaxy of glory. A splendid column commemorated the cities which he had taken, the twelve million human beings whom he had slain or subjected. His triumph was the most magnificent which the Roman citizens had ever witnessed, and by special vote he was permitted to wear his triumphal robe in the Senate as often and as long as might please him. The fireworks over, and with the aureole of glory about his brow, the great Pompey, like another Samson shorn of his locks, dropped into impotency and insignificance. —FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 12.

5720. TRUCE, The holy. Mahometan. An annual festival of two, perhaps of four, months, was observed by the Arabs before the time of Mahomet, during which their swords were religiously sheathed both in foreign and domestic hostility; and this partial truce is more strongly expressive of the habits of anarchy and warfare.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 49, p. 89.

5721. TRUTH, Boldness for the. John Howard. Dining . . . at the house of the English ambassador, Sir Robert Murray Keith, where a large company of Austrian princes and nobles were assembled, the conversation turned upon the absurd iniquity of the torture, when one of the Austrians observed that the glory of abolishing the torture in the Austrian dominions belonged to his present Imperial Majesty Joseph II. "Pardon me," said Howard; "his Imperial Majesty has only abolished one species of torture to establish another in its place more cruel; for the torture which he abolished lasted at the most only a few hours; but that which he has appointed lasts many weeks—nay, sometimes years. The poor wretches are plunged into a noisome dungeon as black as the Black Hole of Calcutta, from which they are taken only if they confess what is laid to their charge." "Hush!" said the ambassador; "your words will be reported to his Majesty." "What!" cried Howard, "shall my tongue be tied from speaking truth by any king or emperor in the world? I repeat what I asserted, and maintain its veracity." The company appeared awestruck at his boldness, and admired it; but no one ventured to make any observation whatever, and a dead silence ensued. They were not, perhaps, aware that he had said the same thing to the emperor himself.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 55.

5722. TRUTH vs. Falsehood. Samuel Johnson. An animated debate took place whether Martinelli should continue his History of England to the present day. GOLDSMITH: "To be sure he should." JOHNSON: "No, sir; he would give great offence. He would have to tell of almost all the living great what they do not wish told". . . GOLDSMITH: "There are people who tell a hundred political lies every day, and are not hurt by it. Surely, then, one may tell truth with safety." JOHNSON: "Why, sir, in the first place, he who tells a hundred lies has disarmed the force of his lies. But besides, a man had rather have a hundred lies told of him than one truth which he does not wish to be told." GOLDSMITH: "For my part, I'd tell the truth, and shame the devil." JOHNSON: "Yes, sir; but the devil will be angry. I wish to shame the devil as much as you do, but I should choose to be out of the reach of his claws." GOLDSMITH: "His claws can do you no harm when you have the shield of truth."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 207.

5723. TRUTH vs. Fiction. James II. A dramatist would scarcely venture to bring on the stage a grave prince, in the decline of life, ready to sacrifice his crown in order to serve the interests of his religion, indefatigable in making proselytes, and yet deserting and insulting a wife who had youth and beauty, for the sake of a profligate paramour who had neither. Still less, if possible, would a dramatist venture to introduce a statesman stooping to the wicked and shameful part of a procurer, and calling in his wife to aid him in that dishonorable office, yet, in his moments of leisure, retiring to his closet, and there secretly pouring out his soul to his God in penitient tears and devout ejaculations.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 68.

5724. TRUTH honored. Frederick II. Frederick is by no means one of the perfect demi-gods, and there are various things to be said against him with good ground. To the last a questionable hero, with much in him which one could have wished not there, and much wanting which one could have wished. But there is one feature which strikes you at an early period of the inquiry, that in his way he is a reality; that he always means what he speaks; grounds his actions, too, on what he recognizes for the truth; and, in short, has nothing whatever of the hypocrite or phantasm—which some readers will admit to be an extremely rare phenomenon.—CARLYLE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, Book 1, ch. 1, p. 12.

5725. TRUTH, Liberty by the. Martin Luther. At his bidding truth leaped over the cloister walls, and challenged every man to make her his guest; aroused every intelligence to acts of private judgment; changed a dependent, recipient people into a reflecting, inquiring people; lifted each human being out of the castles of the Middle Age, to endow him with individuality, and to summon man to stand forth as man. The world heaved with the fervent conflict of opinion.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 6.

5726. TRUTH, Moral. From within. Thus did the mind of George Fox arrive at the conclusion that truth is to be sought by listening to the voice of God in the soul. Not the learning of the university, not the Roman see, not the English Church, not Dissenters, not the whole outward world, can lead to a fixed rule of morality. The law in the heart must be received without prejudice, cherished without mixture, and obeyed without fear.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

5727. TRUTH outraged. Inquisition. Galileo was thus compelled to choose between a solemn denial of demonstrated truth or the most agonizing of deaths. What he ought to have done in these circumstances is a question in morals which has been discussed for two hundred years without result, since it is a question which every one decides according to his own character. He decided to recant. On his knees, with one hand upon the Gospel, he pronounced the form of words required: "I abjure, curse, and detest the error and heresy of the motion of the earth, and promise that I will never more teach, verbally or in writing, that the sun is the centre of the universe, and immovable, and that the earth is not the centre of the universe and movable." Rising from his knees, indignant at the outrage done to truth through him, he muttered between his teeth the words which will never be forgotten—"The earth moves, notwithstanding!"—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 264.

5728. TRUTH, Perilous. A.D. 408. The senators loudly declared, in regular speeches or in tumultuary acclamations, that it was unworthy of the majesty of Rome to purchase a precarious and disgraceful truce from a Barbarian king; and that, in the judgment of a magnanimous people, the chance of ruin was always preferable to the certainty of dishonor. . . . The tumult of virtue and freedom subsided; and the sum of four thousand pounds of gold was granted, under the name of a subsidy, to secure the peace of Italy and to conciliate the friendship of the king of the Goths. Lampadius alone, one of the most illustrious members of the assembly, still persisted in his dissent; exclaimed, with a loud voice, "This is not a treaty of peace, but of servitude;" and escaped the danger of such bold opposition by immediately retiring to the sanctuary of a Christian church.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 30, p. 231.

5729. TRUTH, Perversion of. Habit. [Mr. Hallam says of Charles II. he] "had unhappily long been in the habit of perverting his natural acuteness to the mean subterfuges of equivocal language." . . . [Knight says:] "In no situation or difficulty could this unfortunate king give up his system of double-dealing and half-confidence." [When he was making treaties for the pacification of Ireland, and promised that during the negotiations all hostilities for his cause should end, at the very same time he wrote to Ormond, the general in command,] "Obey my wife's orders, and not mine, until I shall let you know I am free from all restraint; nor trouble yourself about my concessions as to Ireland; they will lead to nothing."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 1.

5730. TRUTH, Power of speculative. Quakers. [William] Penn exults that the message [from the inner voice] came without suspicion of human wisdom. It was wonderful to witness the energy and the unity of mind and character which the strong perception of speculative truth imparted to the most illiterate mechanics; they delivered the oracles of conscience with fearless freedom and natural eloquence; and with happy unconscious sagacity spontaneously developed the system of moral truth which, as they believed, existed as an incorruptible seed in every soul.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 16.

5731. TRUTH, Vitality of the. Political. Truth once elicited never dies. As it descends through time it may be transmitted from State to State, from monarch to commonwealth, but its light is never extinguished, and never permitted to fall to the ground. A great truth, if no existing nation would assume its guardianship, has power—such is God's providence—to call a nation into being and life by the life it imparts.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 21.

5732. TRUTHS, Preparatory. Inventions. A century before the Christian era the mighty power of steam had been observed, and some attempts had been made to turn it to account. But a great invention, as we have before remarked, is the growth of ages. Many ingenious men had labored to perfect this one, the greatest of all, and they had brought it on so far, that a single improvement alone was wanting to make it available. It was just so with Sir Isaac Newton's sublime discovery of the attraction of gravitation. Previous philosophers had made discoveries that only needed combining to produce the final truth, which, in a happy hour, flashed upon the mind of Newton.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 142.

5733. TRUTHS, Uncertain. Sophists. Greece was, in the days of Socrates, overrun with Sophists—pretended philosophers, whose whole science consisted in a certain futile logic; an artificial apparatus of general arguments, which they could apply to every topic, and by which they could maintain, with an appearance of plausibility, either side of any proposition. It was usual for these philosophers to get up in the public assemblies or in the theatres and offer to argue or make an oration on any subject that should be named. The Athenians, a superficial people, fond of everything new and extraordinary, were quite captivated with this kind of jugglery. The Sophists passed for the wisest and most eloquent of men, and the youth flocked in crowds to their schools, where the rudiments of this precious art were explained and communicated. The sober part of the Athenians judged this to be a very useless discipline; but the wiser Socrates saw the pernicious tendency of this new art of philosophizing, which made everything uncertain and problematical; and his penetrating intellect easily perceived the method by which it was to be exposed and destroyed.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 267.

5734. TYRANNY, Cruelty of. Xerxes. [Pythius, a prince of Lydia (see No. 4881),] who had made such obliging offers to Xerxes, having desired as a favor of him, some time afterward, that out of his five sons who served in his army he would be pleased to leave him the eldest, in order to be a support and comfort to him in his old age, the king was so enraged at the proposal, though so reasonable in itself, that he caused the eldest son to be killed before the eyes of his father, giving him to understand that it was a favor that he spared the lives of him and the rest of his children; and then causing the dead body to be cut in two, and one part to be placed on the right and the other on the left, he made the whole army pass between them, as if he meant to purge and purify it by such a sacrifice.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2, § 2.

5735. TYRANNY, Ecclesiastical. Catholic. The childhood of the European nations was passed under the tutelage of the clergy. The ascendancy of the sacerdotal order was long the ascendancy which naturally and properly belongs to intellectual superiority. The priests, with all their faults, were by far the wisest portion of society. It was, therefore, on the whole, good that they should be respected and obeyed. The encroachments of the ecclesiastical power on the province of the civil power produced much more happiness than misery, while the ecclesiastical power was in the hands of the only class that had studied history, philosophy, and public law, and while the civil power was in the hands of savage chiefs, who could not read their own grants and edicts. But a change took place. Knowledge gradually spread among laymen. At the commencement of the sixteenth century many of them were in every intellectual attainment fully equal to the most enlightened of their spiritual pastors. Thenceforward that dominion which, during the Dark Ages, had been, in spite of many abuses, a legitimate and a salutary guardianship, became an unjust and noxious tyranny.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 44.

5736. TYRANNY, Emblem of. The Bastille. The destruction of the Bastille was the type of the fall of tyranny to Englishmen and Englishwomen. Hannah More writes to Horace Walpole: "Poor France! though I am sorry that the lawless rabble are so triumphant, I cannot help hoping that some good will arise from the sum of human misery having been so considerably lessened at one blow by the destruction of the Bastile." Dumont says that in England . . . the destruction of the Bastile had caused a general joy.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 10, p. 183.

5737. TYRANNY, Insurrection against. Peasants. The frightful insurrection called the Jacquerie was a general rising of the enslaved peasants of the provinces against the nobles, prompted not so much by the love of liberty as by the desperation of utter and hopeless misery, and a ferocious thirst of vengeance upon their tyrants. The revolt of the Jacques, as they were called (from the familiar nickname of Jacques Bonhomme, applied to the French peasantry), commenced in the neighborhood of Clermont and Beauvais, in May, 1358, and quickly overspread the northern and western districts. It was a war of wholesale extermination; the feudal châteaux were assailed, sacked, burnt, and razed to the ground, and their inmates, down to the youngest infant, put to the sword with every circumstance of almost incredible barbarity.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 10, § 13.

5738. TYRANNY, Legislative. Long Parliament. Like Rome under its decemviri, England was enslaved by its legislators; English liberty had become the patrimony of the Commons; the forms of government, the courts of justice, peace and war—all executive, all legislative, power rested with them. They were irresponsible, absolute, and apparently never to be dissolved but at their own pleasure.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 11.

5739. TYRANNY of Liberty. French Revolution. On June 10 [1794] resolutions were presented to the convention by Couthon for conferring increased and monstrous powers on the revolutionary tribunal. It was to be divided into four courts, for the more expeditious despatch of business; the "enemies of the republic," against whom it was to act, were defined in the most vague, arbitrary, and comprehensive terms; the juries were empowered to convict without examining witnesses or hearing counsel, and upon any proof, material or moral, verbal or written, which they might deem sufficient; and the sole penalty to be inflicted for all offences was death. This frightful proposition, which . . . placed the lives . . . of the whole French nation at the absolute disposal of Robespierre, . . . was ultimately adopted. Its effects were appalling. Between the 10th of June and the 27th of July, 1794, upward of fourteen hundred victims perished by the hands of the executioner. The daily batches (fournées) frequently included fifty, and even sixty, seventy, and eighty individuals. Fouquier-Tinville, the public accuser, at length proposed to erect the guillotine in a hall adjoining the tribunal, and to despatch five hundred prisoners in one day.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 27, § 6, p. 572.

5740. — — — "Revolutionary Tribunal." [On the 10th of March, 1793, forty-eight days after the execution of Louis XVI., this tribunal was formed. It was] composed of five judges, who were to be bound by no forms of procedure, and of a permanent jury. These jurymen were to satisfy themselves as to facts in any way that they could, and to vote audibly in the presence of a Paris mob. To direct the proceedings of this awful tribunal, from whose decrees there was no appeal, a public accuser was appointed. . . . He had only one remedy for the cure of lukewarmness toward the Revolution—death. He was in so great a hurry to do his work, that identity of person was sometimes unnecessary when an accused stood before him. Two women of the same name having been arrested, he settled the accounts of both, for fear of a mistake.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 15, p. 272.

5741. TYRANNY, Parental. Frederick William I. [Princess Wilhelmina received his special displeasure. Her brother Fritz (Frederick the Great) had vainly endeavored to escape his father's tyranny by flight, and was under arrest.] "We learned from some attendant that at least my brother was not dead. The king now came back. We all ran to kiss his hands; but me he no sooner noticed than rage and fury took possession of him. He became black in the face, his eyes sparkling fire, his mouth foaming. 'Infamous canaille,' said he; 'darest thou show thyself before me? Go, keep thy scoundrel of a brother company!' And, so saying, he seized me with one hand, slapping me on the face with the other," clenched as a fist (poing), "several blows, one of which struck me on the temple, so that I fell back, and should have split my head against a corner of the wainscot had not Madame de Sonsfeld caught me by the head and broken the fall. I lay on the ground without consciousness. The king, in a frenzy, was for striking me with his feet, had not the queen, my sisters, and the rest ran between, and those who were present prevented him. They all ranked themselves round me, which gave Mesdames de Kamecke and Sonsfeld time to pick me up. They put me in a chair in the embrasure of a window; threw water on my face to bring me to life, which care I lamentably reproached them with, death being a thousand times better in the past things had come to. The queen kept shrieking; her firmness had quite left her; she wrung her hands, and ran in despair up and down the room. The king's face was so disfigured with rage it was frightful to look upon. The little ones were on their knees begging for me."—CARLYLE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, Book 7, ch. 7, p. 205.

5742. TYRANNY, Recompensed for. France. It is to Louis XI., who was a vicious, unprincipled tyrant, that France owed the extension of her commerce, the establishment of posts through the kingdom, and the regular administration of justice.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 13, p. 214.

5743. TYRANNY, Self-destructive. Reign of Commodus. [The Roman emperor] Commodus had now attained the summit of vice and infamy. Amid the acclamations of a flattering court, he was unable to disguise from himself that he had deserved the contempt and hatred of every man of sense and virtue in his empire. His ferocious spirit was irritated by the consciousness of that hatred, by the envy of every kind of merit, by the just apprehension of danger, and by the habit of slaughter, which he contracted in his daily amusements. History has preserved a long list of consular senators sacrificed to his wanton suspicion, which sought out, with peculiar anxiety, those unfortunate persons connected, however remotely, with the family of Antoninus, without sparing even the ministers of his crimes or pleasures. His cruelty proved at last fatal to himself. He had shed with impunity the noblest blood of Rome; he perished as soon as he was dreaded by his own domestics. Marcia, his favorite concubine, Eclectus, his chamberlain, and Lætus, his pretorian prefect, alarmed by the fate of their companions and predecessors, resolved to prevent the destruction which every hour hung over their heads, either from the mad caprice of the tyrant, or the sudden indignation of the people. [They poisoned him.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 115.

5744. TYRANNY, Shameful. At San Domingo. [Columbus had been slandered and sent home in irons.] Las Casas gives an indignant picture of the capricious tyranny exercised over the Indians by worthless Spaniards, many of whom had been transported convicts from the dungeons of Castile. These wretches, who in their own countries had been the vilest among the vile, here assumed the tone of grand cavaliers. They insisted upon being attended by trains of servants. They took the daughters and female relations of caciques for their domestics, or rather for their concubines, nor did they limit themselves in number. When they travelled, instead of using horses and mules with which they were provided, they obliged the natives to transport them upon their shoulders in litters, or hammocks, with others attending to hold umbrellas of palm-leaves over their heads to keep off the sun, and fans of feathers to cool them; and Las Casas affirms that he has seen the backs and shoulders of the unfortunate Indians who bore these litters raw and bleeding from the task. When these arrogant upstarts arrived at an Indian village they consumed and lavished away the provisions of the inhabitants, seizing upon whatever pleased their caprice, and obliging the cacique and his subjects to dance before them for their amusement.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 14, ch. 3.

5745. TYRANNY, Terrible. Gildo. Gildo, the brother of the tyrant Firmus, . . . was invested with the command of Africa. His ambition soon usurped the administration of justice and of the finances, without account and without control. . . . During those twelve years [of his reign] the provinces of Africa groaned under the domination of a tyrant. . . . The forms of law were often superseded by the use of poison; and if the trembling guests who were invited to the table of Gildo presumed to express their fears, the insolent suspicion served only to excite his fury, and he loudly summoned the ministers of death. Gildo alternately indulged the passions of avarice and lust; and if his days were terrible to the rich, his nights were not less dreadful to husbands and parents. The fairest of their wives and daughters were prostituted to the embraces of the tyrant, and afterward abandoned to a ferocious troop of Barbarians and assassins, the black, or swarthy, natives of the desert, whom Gildo considered as the only guardians of his throne.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 29, p. 181.

5746. UMPIRE, A dangerous. Scotland. There appeared two illustrious competitors for the crown—Robert Bruce, son of Isabella, second daughter of the Earl of Huntingdon, and John Baliol, grandson of Margaret, the earl's eldest daughter. As the rules of succession are now understood, the right of Baliol, the grandson of the eldest daughter, was clearly preferable. But in those days the order of succession was not so certainly established, and each competitor had his pretensions supported by a formidable party in the kingdom. To avoid a civil war, which must otherwise have taken place, the candidates agreed to a measure which had very near proved fatal to the independence of the kingdom. They chose Edward I. of England to be umpire of the contest; and this ambitious and artful prince determined to avail himself of the powers thus bestowed on him, and to arrogate to himself the sovereignty of Scotland. He summoned all the Scottish barons to attend him at the castle of Norham, in Northumberland; and having gained some and intimidated others, he prevailed on the whole assembly to acknowledge Scotland a fief of the English crown, and to swear allegiance to him as their sovereign or liege lord. He next demanded possession of the kingdom, that he might be able to deliver it to him whose right should be found preferable; and such was the dastardly pusillanimity of all present, whom Edward had intimidated by bringing with him a very formidable army, that this exorbitant demand was likewise complied with, both by the barons and the competitors for the crown. One man alone, worthy of an eternal memorial, Gilbert de Umfraville, Earl of Angus, sustained the honor of his country, and peremptorily refused to deliver up those castles which he held from the Scottish kings. Edward, who believed Baliol the least formidable of the competitors, adjudged the question in his favor, and put him in possession of the kingdom, after making him solemnly take the oath of fidelity to himself as lord paramount, and subscribe to every condition which he thought proper to require. But the Scots were not long patient under their state of subjection.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 12, p. 190.

5747. UNANIMITY in Wrong-doing. Taxing Colonies. On the 9th of March, 1764, George Grenville made his first appearance in the House of Commons as Chancellor of the Exchequer, to unfold the budget. . . . He gave notice. . . that it was his intention, in the next session, to bring in a bill imposing stamp-duties in America. . . . The opposition were publicly called upon to deny, if they thought it fitting, the right of the legislature to impose any tax, internal or external, on the colonies; not a single person ventured to controvert that right.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 9.

5748. UNBELIEF, Vicious. Samuel Johnson. I described to him an impudent fellow from Scotland, who affected to be a savage, and . . . maintained that there was no distinction between virtue and vice. JOHNSON: "Why, sir, if the fellow does not think as he speaks, he is lying; and I see not what honor he can propose to himself from having the character of a liar. But if he does really think that there is no distinction between virtue and vice, why, sir, when he leaves our houses let us count our spoons."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 119.

5749. UNION by Intercourse. Christians. [In 1655] the Quakers, who were hunted and persecuted by every other sect, found a friend in Cromwell. George Fox, who had been seized in his preachings and carried to London, managed to see the Protector, and exhorted him to keep in the fear of God; and Cromwell, having patiently listened to his lecture, parted with him, saying, "Come again to my house. If thou and I were but an hour of the day together, we should be nearer, one to the other. I wish no more harm to thee than I do to my own soul."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 12, p. 193.

5750. UNION by Peril. Reign of James II. The amity of the Whigs and Tories had not survived the peril which had produced it. On several occasions, during the prince's march from the west, dissension had appeared among his followers. While the event of his enterprise was doubtful, that dissension had, by his skillful management, been easily quieted. But from the day on which he entered Saint James' in triumph, such management could no longer be practised. His victory, by relieving the nation from the strong dread of popish tyranny, had deprived him of half his influence. Old antipathies, which had slept when bishops were in the Tower, when Jesuits were at the council board, when loyal clergymen were deprived of their bread by scores, when loyal gentlemen were put out of the commission of the peace by hundreds, were again strong and active.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 563.

5751. UNION, Primitive. Christian. The contempt of the world exercised them in the habits of humility, meekness, and patience. The more they were persecuted, the more closely they adhered to each other. Their mutual charity and unsuspecting confidence has been remarked by infidels, and was too often abused by perfidious friends.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 15, p. 546.

5752. UNRULINESS, Childish. Frederick II. His governness, the Dame Montbail, having ordered him to do something which was intolerable to the princely mind, the princely mind resisted in a very strange way: the princely body, namely, flung itself suddenly out of a third-story window, nothing but the hands left within; and hanging on there by the sill, and fixedly resolute to obey gravitation rather than Montbail, soon brought the poor lady to terms; upon which, indeed, he had been taken from her, and from the women altogether, as evidently now needing rougher government.—CARLYLE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, Book 1, ch. 3, p. 8.

5753. UNWORTHINESS, Depressed by. Bunyan. His judgment was in the main satisfied that the Bible was, as he had been taught, the Word of God. This, however, helped him little; for in the Bible he read his own condemnation. The weight which pressed him down was the sense of his unworthiness. What was he that God should care for him? He fancied that he heard God saying to the angels, "This poor, simple wretch doth hanker after me, as if I had nothing to do with my mercy but to bestow it on such as he. Poor fool, how art thou deceived! it is not for such as thee to have favor with the Highest."—FROUDE'S BUNYAN, ch. 3.

5754. USAGE not Law. Ecclesiastical. [When the Commons were resisting the exactions of the clergy in 1529, the representatives of the Church defended the severe extortions on the ground of usage.] The laity retorted in the words of a barrister of Gray's Inn: "The usage hath ever been of thieves to rob on Shooter's hill—ergo, it is lawful."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 20.

5755. USE or Abuse. Money. [The father of Herod the Great] must have ended his life in poverty and contempt, had he not discovered an immense treasure buried under an old house, the last remains of his patrimony. According to the rigor of the law, the emperor might have asserted his claim, and the prudent Atticus prevented, by a frank confession, the officiousness of informers. But the equitable Nerva, who then filled the throne, refused to accept any part of it, and commanded him to use, without scruple, the present of fortune. The cautious Athenian still insisted that the treasure was too considerable for a subject, and that he knew not how to use it. "Abuse it, then," replied the monarch, with a good-natured peevishness, "for it is your own."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 2, p. 57.

5756. USEFULNESS, Survival of. Monks. [Reign of Henry VIII.] Master of convocation, absolute master of the bishops, Henry had become master of the monastic orders through the right of visitation over them which had been transferred by the act of supremacy from the papacy to the crown. The monks were soon to know what this right of visitation implied in the hands of the vicar-general. As an outlet for religious enthusiasm, monasticism was practically dead. The friar, now that his fervor of devotion and his intellectual energy had passed away, had sunk into a mere beggar. The monks had become mere land-owners. Most of the religious houses were anxious only to enlarge their revenues and to diminish the number of those who shared them. In the general carelessness which prevailed as to the spiritual objects of their trust, in the wasteful management of their estates, in the indolence and self-indulgence which for the most part characterized them, the monastic establishments simply exhibited the faults of all corporate bodies that have outlived the work which they were created to perform.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 573.

5757. USURY inevitable. A.D. 408. At Rome commerce was always held in contempt; but the senators, from the first age of the republic, increased their patrimony and multiplied their clients by the lucrative practice of usury; and the obsolete laws were eluded, or violated, by the mutual inclinations and interest of both parties.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 251.

5758. USURY, Law of. Roman. Usury, the inveterate grievance of the city, had been discouraged by the Twelve Tables and abolished by the clamors of the people. It was revived by their wants and idleness, tolerated by the discretion of the prætors, and finally determined by the code of Justinian. Persons of illustrious rank were confined to the moderate profit of four per cent; six was pronounced to be the ordinary and legal standard of interest; eight was allowed for the convenience of manufacturers and merchants; twelve was granted to nautical insurance, which the wiser ancients had not attempted to define; but, except in this perilous adventure, the practice of exorbitant usury was severely restrained.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 368.

5759. ——. Lucullus. [He found the cities of Asia which he conquered in great distress.] In the first place, he ordered the creditors not to take above one in the hundred for a month's interest; in the next place, he abolished all interest that exceeded the principal; the third and most important regulation was, that the creditor should not take above a fourth part of the debtor's income. And if any one took interest upon interest, he was to lose all. By these means, in less than four years, all the debts were paid, and the estates restored free to the proprietors.—PLUTARCH'S LUCULLUS.

5760. USURY, Laws against. Fifteenth Century. [It was] enacted, "that all manner of persons lending money to and for a time, taking for the same loan anything more besides or above the money lent, by way of contract or covenant at the time of the said loan, should forfeit half the money so lent."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 15, p. 249.

5761. UTILITY vs. Beauty. Sir Walter Scott. [Political speech.] "We in this district," he said, "are proud, and with reason, that the first chain-bridge was the work of a Scotchman. It still hangs where he erected it a pretty long time ago. The French heard of our invention, and determined to introduce it, but with great improvements and embellishments. . . . It was on the Seine at Marly. The French chain-bridge looked lighter and airier than the prototype. Every Englishman present was disposed to confess that we had been beaten at our own trade. But by and by the gates were opened, and the multitude were to pass over. It began to swing rather formidably beneath the pressure of the good company; and by the time the architect, who led the procession in great pomp and glory, reached the middle, the whole gave way, and he—worthy, patriotic artist—was the first that got a ducking. They had forgot the middle bolt—or rather this ingenious person had conceived that to be a clumsy-looking feature, which might safely be dispensed with, while he put some invisible gimcrack of his own to supply its place."—HUTTON'S SCOTT, ch. 12.

5762. VACCINATION opposed. Edward Jenner. For thirty years after this antidote for the small-pox was first practised in 1800, the wholly ignorant and imperfectly educated still stood in the way of this great blessing. [Edward Jenner was the discoverer.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 7, p. 130.

5763. VAGRANTS, Imposition of. England. [A committee of the House of Commons, in 1816, obtained evidence respecting mendicancy and vagrancy in London and its vicinity.] The chief tendency of the evidence was to show how the sturdy beggar was a capitalist and an epicure; ate fowls and beefsteaks for supper and despised broken meat; had money in the funds, and left handsome legacies to his relations. The witnesses had famous stories of a lame impostor who tied up his leg in a wooden frame, and a blind one who wrote letters in the evening for his unlettered brethren; of a widow who sat for ten years with twins who never grew bigger.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 4, p. 66.

5764. VALOR, Military. Derar the Saracen. His single lance maintained a flying fight against thirty Romans, who were detached by Werdan; and, after killing or unhorsing seventeen of their number, Derar returned in safety to his applauding brethren. When his rashness was mildly censured by the general, he excused himself with the simplicity of a soldier. "Nay," said Derar, "I did not begin first; but they came out to take me, and I was afraid that God should see me turn my back; and indeed I fought in good earnest, and without doubt God assisted me against them; and had I not been apprehensive of disobeying your orders, I should not have come away as I did; and I perceive already that they will fall into our hands."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 195.

5765. VALOR, Mutual. Ancient Germans. In the hour of danger it was shameful for the chief to be surpassed in valor by his companions—shameful for the companions not to equal the valor of their chief. To survive his fall in battle was indelible infamy. To protect his person and to adorn his glory with the trophies of their own exploits were the most sacred of their duties.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 266.

5766. VALOR, Proof of. Ticonderoga taken. A.D. 1775. [Ethan Allen, his Green Mountain boys, and others to the number of eighty-three, arrived at daybreak without discovery.] Allen addressed them: "Friends and fellow-soldiers, we must this morning quit our pretensions for valor, or possess ourselves of this fortress; and inasmuch as it is a desperate attempt, I do not urge it on, contrary to will. You that will undertake voluntarily, poise your firelocks." . . . Every firelock was poised. "Face to the right," cried Allen. . . . [They] marched to the gate, . . . rushed into the fort, . . . raising the Indian war-whoop, and . . . formed . . . in hollow square. [Being summoned, Captain] Delaplace, the commander, came out, undressed, with his breeches in his hand. "Deliver to me the fort instantly," said Allen. "By what authority?" . . . "In the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress." What cost the British nation eight millions sterling . . . and many lives was won in ten minutes by a few undisciplined men, without loss. [Nearly 50 prisoners, 100 cannon, one thirteen-inch mortar, a number of swivels, stores, and small arms were captured.]—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 7, ch. 32.

5767. VALOR, Spur to. Reputation. And it seems to me that the ancients did not think that valor consists in the exemption from fear, but, on the contrary, in the fear of reproach and the dread of infamy; for those who stand most in fear of the law act with the greatest intrepidity against the enemy; and they who are most tender of their reputation look with the least concern upon other dangers.—PLUTARCH'S CLEOMENES.

5768. VALOR, Wonderful. Constantine. [We might] relate a wonderful exploit of Constantine, which, though it can scarcely be paralleled either in poetry or romance, is celebrated, not by a venal orator devoted to his fortune, but by an historian, the partial enemy of his fame. We are assured that the valiant emperor threw himself into the river Hebrus, accompanied only by twelve horsemen, and that by the effort or terror of his invincible arm he broke, slaughtered, and put to flight a host of 150,000 men.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14, p. 499.

5769. VALUE, Change in. Manhattan Island. In January of 1626 Peter Minuit, of Wesel, was regularly appointed by the Dutch West India Company as governor of New Netherland. Until this time the natives had retained the ownership of Manhattan Island; but on Minuit's arrival, in May, an offer of purchase was made and accepted. The whole island, containing more than twenty thousand acres, was sold to the Dutch for twenty-four dollars.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 18, p. 162.

5770. ———. Tyrian Purple. The Tyrian purple is celebrated by all the ancient authors. The color was the pure juice of a particular kind of shell-fish, and being produced in very small quantities, came thence to be of great value. The moderns are not unacquainted with the fish, but make no use of it, as a richer color is produced at much less expense from the cochineal insect.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 6, p. 51.

5771. VALUES, Conventional. West Indians. [Columbus' first voyage.] The avarice of the discoverers was quickly excited by the sight of small ornaments of gold, worn by some of the natives in their noses. These the latter gladly exchanged for glass beads and hawks' bells; and both parties exulted in the bargain, no doubt admiring each other's simplicity.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 4, ch. 1.

5772. VANITY, Excessive. Roman Emperor Diocletian. The Asiatic pomp which had been adopted by the pride of Diocletian assumed an air of softness and effeminacy in the person of Constantine. He is represented with false hair of various colors, laboriously arranged by the skilful artists of the times; a diadem of a new and more expensive fashion; a profusion of gems and pearls, of collars and bracelets, and a variegated flowing robe of silk, most curiously embroidered with flowers of gold. In such apparel, scarcely to be excused by the youth and folly of Elagabalus, we are at a loss to discover the wisdom of an aged monarch and the simplicity of a Roman veteran.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 18, p. 156.

5773. VANITY, Folly of. Madman. One day, as Artaxerxes was hunting, Tiribazus showed him a rent in his robe, upon which the king said, "What shall I do with it?" "Put on another, and give that to me," said Tiribazus. "It shall be so," said the king; "I give it thee, but I charge thee not to wear it." Tiribazus, who, though not a bad man, was giddy and vain, disregarding the restriction, soon put on the robe, and at the same time tricked himself out with some golden ornaments, fit only for queens. The court expressed great indignation, because it was a thing contrary to their laws and customs; but the king only laughed, and said to him, "I allow thee to wear the trinkets as a woman, and the robe as a madman."—PLUTARCH'S ARTAXERXES.

5774. VANITY, Foolish. Ferguson. [Rebellion of the Duke of Monmouth against James II.] One of the insurgent chiefs was named Ferguson.] . . . With this man's knavery was strangely mingled an eccentric vanity which resembled madness. The thought that he had raised a rebellion and bestowed a crown had turned his head. He swaggered about, brandishing his naked sword, and crying to the crowd of spectators who had assembled to see the army march out of Taunton, "Look at me! You have heard of me. I am Ferguson, the famous Ferguson, the Ferguson for whose head so many hundred pounds have been offered." And this man, at once unprincipled and brain-sick, had in his keeping the understanding and the conscience of the unhappy Monmouth.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 548.

5775. VANITY with Greatness. Queen Elizabeth. A happy retort or a finished compliment never failed to win her favor. She hoarded jewels. Her dresses were innumerable. Her vanity remained, even to old age, the vanity of a coquette in her teens. No adulation was too fulsome for her, no flattery of her beauty too gross. She would play with her rings that her courtiers might note the delicacy of her hands, or dance a coranto that an ambassador, hidden dexterously behind a curtain, might report her sprightliness to his master.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 710.

5776. VANITY rebuked. "Fine Coat." A foppish physician once reminded [Samuel] Johnson of his having been in company with him on a former occasion. "I do not remember it, sir." The physician still insisted, adding that he that day wore so fine a coat that it must have attracted his notice. "Sir," said Johnson, "had you been dipped in Pactolus, I should not have noticed you."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 530.

5777. ———. Oliver Goldsmith's. Goldsmith, to divert the tedious minutes, strutted about, bragging of his dress, and I believe was seriously vain of it, for his mind was wonderfully prone to such impressions. "Come, come," said Garrick, "talk no more of that. You are, perhaps, the worst—eh, eh!" Goldsmith was eagerly attempting to interrupt him, when Garrick went on, laughing ironically, "Nay, you will always look like a gentleman; but I am talking of being well or ill dressed." "Well, let me tell you," said Goldsmith, "when my tailor brought home my bloom-colored coat, he said, 'Sir, I have a favor to beg of you. When anybody asks you who made your clothes, be pleased to mention John Filby, at the Harrow, in Water Lane.'" JOHNSON: "Why, sir, that was because he knew the strange color would attract crowds to gaze at it, and thus they might hear of him, and see how well he could make a coat, even of so absurd a color."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 163.

5778. ———. Plato. Archytas, who had engaged for Plato's safety, when he understood his danger [from Dionysius the tyrant], sent a galley to demand him; and the tyrant, to palliate his enmity, previous to his departure made pompous entertainments. At one of them, however, he could not help saying, "I suppose, Plato, when you return to your companions in the academy, my faults will often be the subject of your conversation." "I hope," answered Plato, "we shall never be so much at a loss for subjects in the academy as to talk of you."—PLUTARCH'S DIONYSIUS.

5779. ——. Menecrates. [He assumed the title Menecrates Jupiter. He was a physician.] King Philip hit upon a remedy for his visionary correspondent. Philip invited him to a grand entertainment. Menecrates had a separate table, where nothing was served up to him but incense and perfume, while all the other guests fed upon the most exquisite dainties. The first transports of joy with which he was seized, when he found his divinity acknowledged, made him forget that he was a man; but hunger afterward forcing him to recollect his being so, . . . he took leave of the company abruptly.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 14, § 8.

5780. VANITY, Ridiculous. Monumental. The triumphal arch of Constantine still remains a melancholy proof of the decline of the arts, and a singular testimony of the meanest vanity. As it was not possible to find in the capital of the empire a sculptor who was capable of adorning that public monument, the arch of Trajan, without any respect either for his memory or for the rules of propriety, was stripped of its most elegant figures. The difference of times and persons, of actions and characters, was totally disregarded. The Parthian captives appear prostrate at the feet of a prince who never carried his arms beyond the Euphrates; and curious antiquarians can still discover the head of Trajan on the trophies of Constantine. The new ornaments which it was necessary to introduce between the vacancies of ancient sculpture are executed in the rudest and most unskilful manner.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 14, p. 483.

5781. VANITY, Victim of. Alexander. His only fault [in conversation] was his retaining so much of the soldier as to indulge a troublesome vanity. He would not only boast of his own actions, but suffered himself to be cajoled by flatterers to an amazing degree. These wretches were an intolerable burden to the rest of the company, who did not choose to contend with them in adulation, nor yet to appear behind them in their opinion of their king's achievements.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

5782. VASSALAGE, Humiliating. Charles II. to Louis XIV. Since the king was bent on emancipating himself from the control of Parliament, and since, in such an enterprise, he could not hope for effectual aid at home, it followed that he must look for it abroad. The power and wealth of the King of France might be equal to the arduous task of establishing absolute monarchy in England. Such an ally would undoubtedly expect substantial proofs of gratitude for such a service. Charles must descend to the rank of a great vassal, and must make peace and war according to the directions of the government which protected him. . . . His relation to Louis would closely resemble that in which the Rajah of Nagpore and the King of Oude now stand to the British Government. Those princes are bound to aid the East India Company in all hostilities, defensive and offensive, and to have no diplomatic relations but such as the East India Company shall sanction. The Company, in return, guarantees them against insurrection.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 191.

5783. VEGETARIAN, Trials of the. Joseph Ritson. John Leyden's great antipathy was Ritson, an ill-conditioned antiquarian, of vegetarian principles, whom Scott alone of all the antiquarians of that day could manage to tame and tolerate. In Scott's absence one day, during his early married life at Lasswade, Mrs. Scott inadvertently offered Ritson a slice of beef, when that strange man burst out in such outrageous tones at what he chose to suppose an insult, that Leyden threatened to "thraw his neck" if he were not silent—a threat which frightened Ritson out of the cottage. On another occasion, simply in order to tease Ritson, Leyden complained that the meat was overdone, and sent to the kitchen for a plate of literally raw beef, and ate it up solely for the purpose of shocking his crazy rival in antiquarian research.—HUTTON'S LIFE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT, ch. 6.

5784. VENGEANCE, Cry for. Mary Queen of Scots. The lords conducted the queen as a prisoner to Edinburgh Castle. In passing through the army she was assailed with the imprecations of the military and the populace. The soldiers waved before her horse a banner, on which was represented the dead body of Darnley [her murdered husband, whose death she had caused] lying beside his page in the orchard of Kirk o' Field, and the little King James on his knees invoking the vengeance of Heaven against his mother and the murderer of his unhappy father, in these words of the royal poet of Israel, "Judge and avenge my cause, O Lord!" "By this royal hand," she said to Lord Lindsay, who had aided in the unpardonable murder of her first favorite, Rizzio, "I'll have your heads for this!"—LAMARTINE'S MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 32.

5785. ——. Against Murderers. It was a law of the State, that any man invested with a military command might frustrate any charge brought against him by going on service. Sylla therefore defeated the purpose of his enemies by repairing immediately to his army, and commencing the campaign against Mithridates. His partisans at Rome, in the mean time, took advantage of a series of violent and illegal proceedings of Cinna, to procure his deposition from office, and his expulsion from the city. Marius, returning to Italy at this juncture, found means to levy a considerable army, and joining his forces to those of Cinna, they laid siege to Rome, at that time reduced to great distress by famine. In this situation, the Senate capitulated with these traitors in arms, repealed the attainder of Marius, and restored Cinna to his consular function. They entered the city triumphantly at the head of the army, and immediately gave orders for a general massacre of all those citizens whom they regarded as their enemies. The scene was horrible beyond all description. The heads of the senators, streaming with blood, were stuck up before the rostra; "a dumb senate," says an ancient writer, "but which yet cried aloud to Heaven for vengeance."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1, p. 394.

5786. VENGEANCE demanded. Virtue dishonored. [Tarquinius'] son Sextus, lawless and flagitious, had committed a rape on Lucretia, the wife of Collatinus, and the injured matron, un able to survive her dishonor, stabbed herself in the presence of her husband and kindred. Brutus, a witness to this shocking scene, drew the dagger from her breast, and swore by the eternal gods to be the avenger of her death—an oath immediately taken by all who were present. The dead body of the violated Lucretia was brought into the forum, and Brutus, throwing off his assumed disguise of insanity, appeared the passionate advocate of a just revenge, and the animated orator in the cause of liberty against tyrannical oppression. The people were roused in a moment, and were prompt and unanimous in their procedure. Tarquinius was at this time absent from the city, engaged in a war with the Rutulians. The Senate was assembled, and pronounced a decree which banished forever the tyrant, and at the same time utterly abolished the name and office of king.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 2, p. 302.

5787. VENGEANCE, Diabolical. John Wilkes Booth. He had been from the outbreak of the rebellion one of the most fanatical devotees; and as its strength and prospects of success began to grow less and less, his mind was absorbed in desperate schemes for reviving its fortunes and securing its triumph. . . . What was [at first] . . . a desire to aid the rebellion became, after this was hopeless, a desperate determination to avenge its downfall. He plotted the murder of Mr. Lincoln and of the leading members of the government.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 21, p. 713.

5788. VENGEANCE, Foolish. James II. [He was fleeing from his English subjects, whom he had exasperated by his oppressions.] At three in the morning of Tuesday, the 11th of December, James rose, took the great seal in his hand, laid his commands on Northumberland not to open the door of the bed-chamber till the usual hour, and disappeared through a secret passage. . . . Sir Edward Hales was in attendance with a hackney coach. James was conveyed to Milbank, where he crossed the Thames in a small wherry. As he passed Lambeth he flung the great seal into the midst of the stream, whence, after many months, it was accidentally caught by a fishing-net and dragged up.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 509.

5789. VENGEANCE of God. Appeal to. [A Protestant] nobleman named Villemongis, when brought to the scaffold [at Amboise], dipped his hands in the blood of his slaughtered comrades, and, raising them to Heaven, exclaimed, "Lord, behold the blood of thy children; Thou wilt take vengeance for them!"—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 16, § 2.

5790. VENGEANCE, Maternal. Hannah Dustin. The town of Haverhill, on the Merrimac, was captured under circumstances of special atrocity. Nearly forty persons were butchered in cold blood; only a few were spared for captivity. Among the latter was Mrs. Hannah Dustin. Her child, only a week old, was snatched out of her arms and dashed against a tree. The heartbroken mother, with her nurse and a lad named Leonardson from Worcester, was taken by the savages to an island in the Merrimac, a short distance above Concord. Here, while their captors, twelve in number, were asleep at night, the three prisoners arose, silently armed themselves with tomahawks, and with one deadly blow after another crushed in the temples of the sleeping savages until ten of them lay still in death; then embarking in a canoe the captives dropped down the river, and reached the English settlement in safety. Mrs. Dustin carried home with her the gun and tomahawk of the savage who had destroyed her family, and a bag containing the scalps of her neighbors. It is not often that the mother of a murdered babe has found such ample vengeance.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 16, p. 150.

5791. VENGEANCE, Merciless. James II. [After subduing the rebellion in Scotland, led by the Duke of Argyle.] The vengeance of the conquerors was mercilessly wreaked on the people of Argyleshire. Many of the Campbells were hanged without a trial by Athol. . . . More than three hundred rebels and malcontents were transported to the colonies. Many of them were also sentenced to mutilation. On a single day the hangman of Edinburgh cut off the ears of thirty-five prisoners. Several women were sent across the Atlantic after being first branded in the cheek with a hot iron.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 527.

5792. VENGEANCE, Monument for. Athenians. [After the battle at Marathon.] With presumptuous confidence, the Persians had brought marble from Asia to erect a triumphal monument on the subjugation of their enemies. The Athenians caused a statue of Nemesis, the Goddess of Vengeance, to be formed out of this marble, by the celebrated Phidias; and tablets to be erected, on which were recorded the names of the heroes who had fallen in the fight.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 1, p. 130.

5793. VENGEANCE, Passionate. Governor William Berkeley. [In the early history of Virginia the tyranny of Governor Berkeley was resisted, and he hung twenty-two patriots;] nor is it certain when the vengeful tyrant would have stayed his hand, had not the assembly met and passed an edict that no more blood should be spilt for past offences. One of the burgesses from the county of Northampton said in the debate that if the governor were let alone he would hang half the country. When Charles II. heard of Berkeley's ferocity, he exclaimed, "The old fool has taken away more lives in that naked country than I for the murder of my father;" and the saying was true.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 12, p. 121.

5794. VENGEANCE for Vengeance. "War of the Roses." The head of Duke Richard, crowned in mockery with a diadem of paper, is said to have been impaled on the walls of York. His second son, Lord Rutland, fell crying for mercy on his knees before Clifford. But Clifford's father [Lord Clifford] had been the first to fall in the battle of St. Alban's, which opened the struggle. "As your father killed mine," cried the savage baron, while he plunged his dagger in the young noble's breast, "I will kill you!" The brutal deed was soon to be avenged.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 449.

5795. VENTURE, An instructive. Captive Party of Franks. [A colony of captive Franks] had been established by Probus [the emperor] on the sea-coast of Pontus, with a view of strengthening the frontier against the inroads of the Alani. A fleet stationed in one of the harbors of the Euxine fell into the hands of the Franks; and they resolved, through unknown seas, to explore their way from the mouth of the Phasis to that of [their native country] the Rhine. They easily escaped through the Bosphorus and the Hellespont, and cruising along the Mediterranean, indulged their appetite for revenge and plunder by frequent descents on the unsuspecting shores of Asia, Greece, and Africa. The opulent city of Syracuse, in whose port the navies of Athens and Carthage had formerly been sunk, was sacked by a handful of barbarians, who massacred the greatest part of the trembling inhabitants. From the Island of Sicily the Franks proceeded to the columns of Hercules, trusted themselves to the ocean, coasted round Spain and Gaul, and steering their triumphant course through the British Channel, at length finished their surprising voyage by landing in safety on the Batavian or Frisian shores. The example of their success, instructing their countrymen to conceive the advantages and to despise the dangers of the sea, pointed out to their enterprising spirits a new road to wealth and glory.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 12, p. 384.

5796. VERDICT, A welcome. Reign of James II. [Jeffreys tried Lord Delamere for treason.] All the triers, from Churchill, who, as junior baron, spoke first, up to the treasurer, pronounced, on their honor, that Delamere was not guilty. . . . The public joy at the acquittal of Delamere was great. The reign of terror was over. The innocent began to breathe freely, and false accusers to tremble. One letter written on this occasion is scarcely to be read without tears. The widow of Russell, in her retirement, learned the good news with mingled feelings. "I do bless God," she wrote, "that He has caused some stop to be put to the shedding of blood in this poor land. Yet when I should rejoice with them that do rejoice, I seek a corner to weep in."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 37.

5797. VETO, Power of. Romans. The first tribes of the people were created two hundred and sixty years after the foundation of Rome, and seventeen years after the abolition of the regal government. These magistrates were habited like simple citizens; they had no exterior ensigns of power; they had neither tribunal nor jurisdiction as judges; they had no guards nor attendants, unless a single domestic termed Viator or Apparitor. They stood without the senate-house, nor durst they enter it unless they were called in by the consuls; but possessing . . . the power of suspending or annulling, by a single veto, the most solemn decrees of that body, their influence and authority were very great.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 4, p. 319.

5798. VICE concealed. Bacchanalians. [This society of young people of both sexes met for purposes professedly pious, and at their frequent meetings indulged in every species of promiscuous debauchery,] and even in the commission of the most atrocious crimes; for the youth of either sex whom they rep trained to their abominable purposes, if unwilling victims, usually paid the forfeit of life. A freed woman, anxious for the safety of her lover, disclosed the mysteries to the consul, Postumius, and to him and to his colleague the Senate committed full power to take every necessary measure for the detection and punishment of all concerned in this horrid association, both in Rome and in the other cities of Italy. The number was found to exceed seven thousand. Of these the most guilty were capitally punished; others betook themselves to voluntary banishment; and not a few, from conscious guilt and the terror of punishment, laid violent hands on themselves. The Senate passed a solemn decree that henceforward no individual should presume to offer a sacrifice to Bacchus, at which more than five persons assisted, without a previous permission granted by their body in full assembly.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 9, p. 381.

5799. VICE, Disqualified for. Englishman. The Englishman is held to be "the most unsuccessful rake in the world. He is at variance with himself. He is neither brute enough to enjoy his appetites nor man enough to govern them."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 4, p. 54.

5800. VICE, Patron of. Henry III. Henry abandoned himself without restraint to those disgraceful vices and outrageous buffooneries which were the bane of his character and his reign, and which inflicted a deep and lasting injury on the social condition of France. The court became alternately the scene of unbridled sensuality and of fierce brawls, bloody duels, and licensed assassination. On one occasion three of the king's minions, who were not deficient in personal valor, fought publicly with three creatures of the Duke of Guise. Four of the combatants were killed on the spot, among whom were two of Henry's favorites. Over their dead bodies the monarch made a most preposterous and degrading exhibition of effeminate sorrow and fondness, and erected for them a sumptuous mausoleum in the church of St. Paul at Paris.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 18, § 4.

5801. VICE, Pleasure in. Epicureans. It might have been the chief pleasure of Epicurus to be honest and just in his dealings, but others find pleasure in fraud and chicanery. In short, there is no vice or crime that might not find an apology, or rather a recommendation. Had it not afforded pleasure it would not have been practised or committed. "If it is allowable for me," we shall suppose the disciple of Epicurus to say to his master—"if it is allowable for me to pursue pleasure as my chief object, it is, of consequence, allowable for me to be vicious, if I find pleasure in it." "But you are punished," says Epicurus, "in the consequence; and you will find vice productive of pain instead of pleasure." "Of that," says the disciple, "I take my risk; I look to the consequence, and I find it overbalanced by my present gratification; I find pleasure in this action, notwithstanding the hazard of its consequence; it is therefore allowable for me to commit it." Epicurus must grant that the conclusion is fair and legitimate.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 280.

5802. VICE by Reaction. From Puritanism. Because he had covered his failings with the mask of devotion, men were encouraged to obtrude with cynic impudence all their most scandalous vices on the public eye. Because he had punished illicit love with barbarous severity, virgin purity and conjugal fidelity were to be made a jest. To that sanctimonious jargon, which was his Shibboleth, was opposed another jargon not less absurd and much more odious. As he never opened his mouth except in scriptural phrase, the new breeds of wits and fine gentlemen never opened their mouths without uttering ribaldry of which a porter would now be ashamed, and without calling on their Maker to curse them, sink them, confound them, blast them, and damn them.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 372.

5803. VICE, Schools of. Drinking Places. [After the assassination of Lincoln and the attempted assassination of Mr. Seward at the same hour,] orders were instantly given to close all drinking-shops and all places of public resort in the city.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 21, p. 701.

5804. ———. Prisons. In this apartment all the inmates of the prison, men and women, debtors and felons, passed the day. As the jailer had the privilege of selling beer and liquors to the prisoners, they were supplied with just as much drink as they could pay for; and, consequently, this day-room often presented a scene of riotous debauchery. Every new-comer had to treat the whole company; and all fines, bets, and penalties were discharged by pots of ale and bowls of punch. As no employment was provided for the prisoners, nor any books, most of them spent the day, and every day, in playing cards and in drinking the beer and brandy which were the invariable stakes. The presence of women was frequently the occasion of excesses still more abominable. In this school of depravity, maintained at the expense of the virtuous portion of the community, youthful offenders, whom judicious treatment could easily have rescued, were rendered in a few weeks adepts in all the arts by which crime preys upon virtue. There murderers recounted tales of butchery, highway robbers vaunted their exploits on the road, house-breakers unfolded their secrets and magnified their gains. There young women, imprisoned on suspicion of a trifling theft, were thrown among the most abandoned of their own sex and the most brutal of ours.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 43.

5805. VICES, Dishonored for. Roman Emperor Elagabalus. [See No. 1829.] Elagabalus was massacred by the indignant Prætorians, his mutilated corpse dragged through the streets of the city, and thrown into the Tiber. His memory was branded with eternal infamy by the Senate, the justice of whose decree has been ratified by posterity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 174.

5806. VICES, Victim of. Charles James Fox. [He opposed the subjugation of the colonies by masterly speeches in Parliament.] With talents, good-nature, and truthfulness he had no restraining principles, and looked down with contempt on those who had. Priding himself on ignorance of every self-denying virtue, an adept in debauch, and vain in his excesses, he feared nothing. Unlucky at the gaming-table, . . . draining the cup of pleasure to the dregs, fond of loose women and beloved by them, the delight of profligates, the sport of usurers, impoverished by his vices, he braved scandal, and gloried in a lordly recklessness of his inability to pay his debts. . . . He had a strong will, but never used it to bridle his passions, even though their indulgence wronged his own father or corrupted his young admirers.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 8.

5807. VICTORIES endangered. Sherman's Army. When, on the 19th of March [1865], General Sherman was incautiously approaching Bentonville, he was suddenly attacked by the ever-vigilant Johnston, and for a while the Union army, after all its marches and victories, was in danger of destruction. But the tremendous fighting of General Jefferson C. Davis' division saved the day, and on the 21st Sherman entered Goldsborough unopposed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 66, p. 530.

5808. VICTORIES of Genius. Frederick the Great. The king's fame filled all the world. He had, during the last year, maintained a contest, on terms of advantage, against three powers, the weakest of which had more than three times his resources. He had fought four great pitched battles against superior forces. Three of these battles he had gained; and the defeat of Kolin, repaired as it had been, rather raised than lowered his military renown. The victory of Leuthen is to this day the proudest on the roll of Prussian fame. [Battles of Kolin, Rosbach, and Leuthen; the first and last against the Austrians, the second against the French.]—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 98.

5809. VICTORIES, Succession of. Napoleon I. The Austrians were now driven out of Italy. [A. D. 1797.] Napoleon commenced the campaign with 30,000 men. He received during the progress of these destructive battles 25,000 recruits. Thus in ten months Napoleon, with 55,000 men, had conquered five armies under veteran generals and composed of more than 200,000 highly disciplined Austrian troops. He had taken 100,000 prisoners, and killed and wounded 35,000 men. These were great victories, and "a great victory," said the Duke of Wellington, nobly, "is the most awful thing in the world except a great defeat."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 7.

5810. VICTORY, Bloodless. Pizarro in Peru. The Peruvian inca said: "I desire to be a vassal of the gods alone. I know nothing about the pope, nor his pretended right to dispose of my kingdom; and as to renouncing the religion of my ancestors, it will be time to do that when you have proved to me the truth of yours." As soon as the [Spanish] priest returned with this reply [from the inca], Pizarro ordered his artillery to open. A short but desperate and bloody battle ensued. Rushing himself upon the litter of the inca, Pizarro overturned it and took the monarch prisoner. Then the Peruvians fled, leaving behind them their king, 2000 killed, 3000 prisoners, and an immense booty. Pizarro was wounded in the hand, but he lost not a man of his little army. This single battle made Pizarro master of Peru, which he ruled for the next eight years with sovereign sway.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 327.

5811. VICTORY, Costless. Roman. Belisarius, the Roman general, met the Vandals, who had conquered Carthage, above twenty miles from that city, in a decisive battle. Yet no more than fifty Romans and 800 Vandals were found on the field of battle; so inconsiderable was the carnage of a day which extinguished a nation and transferred the empire of Africa.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 132.

5812. VICTORY, Costly. To Constantius. [He fought the usurper Magentius at Mursa in Hungary.] The number of the slain was computed at 54,000 men, and the slaughter of the conquerors was more considerable than that of the vanquished; a circumstance which proves the obstinacy of the contest, and justifies the observation of an ancient writer, that the forces of the empire were consumed in the fatal battle of Mursa, by the loss of a veteran army, sufficient to defend the frontiers, or to add new triumphs to the glory of Rome.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 18, p. 196.

5813. VICTORY, Decisive. Saratoga. On the 9th of October [1777] Burgoyne reached Saratoga, and attempted to escape to Fort Edward. But Gates and Lincoln now commanded the river, and the proud Briton was hopelessly hemmed in. He held out to the last extremity, and finally, when there were only three days between his soldiers and starvation, was driven to surrender. On the 17th of October terms of capitulation were agreed on, and the whole army, numbering 5791, became prisoners of war. Among the captives were six members of the British Parliament. A splendid train of brass artillery, consisting of 42 pieces, together with nearly 5000 muskets and an immense quantity of ammunition and stores, was the further fruit of the victory. The valor of the patriots had fairly eclipsed the warlike renown of Great Britain.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 40, p. 324.

5814. VICTORY by Enthusiasm. Surrender of Burgoyne, October 1777. [At the battle of Saratoga.] The cause of the great result was the courage and the determined love of freedom. . . . So many of the rank and file were freeholders, or freeholders' sons, that they gave a character to the whole army. . . . When the generals who should have directed them [Generals Gates and Lincoln] remained in camp, their common zeal created a harmonious correspondence of movement, and baffled the high officers and veterans opposed to them.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 24.

5815. VICTORY, Expensive. Pyrrihus. [Pyrrihus withstood the Romans at Asculum, where he was] wounded in the arm with a javelin, and the Samnites plundered his baggage; and the number of the slain, counting the loss on both sides, amounted to above 15,000 men. When they had all quitted the field, and Pyrrhus was congratulated on the victory, he said: "Such another victory and we are undone." For he had lost great part of the forces which he brought with him and all his friends and officers, except a very small number. He had no others to send for to supply their place, and he found his confederates here very cold and spiritless; whereas the Romans filled up their legions with ease and despatch from an inexhaustible fountain which they had at home; and their defeats were so far from discouraging them, that indignation gave them fresh strength and ardor for the war.—PLUTARCH'S PYRRHUS.

5816. VICTORY by Fortune. Pompey. The great Pompey might inscribe on his trophies that he had defeated in battle two millions of enemies and reduced fifteen hundred cities from Lake Mæotis to the Red Sea; but the fortune of Rome flew before his eagles; the nations were oppressed by their own fears, and the invincible legions which he commanded had been formed by the habits of conquest and the discipline of ages.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 42, p. 190.

5817. VICTORY by Generalship. Battle of Princeton. Washington's position was critical in the extreme. To attempt to recross the Delaware was hazardous. To retreat in any direction was to lose all that he had gained by his recent victory. To be beaten in battle was utter ruin. In the great emergency he called a council of war, and announced his determination to leave the camp by night, make a circuit to the east, pass the British left flank, and strike the detachment at Princeton before his antagonist could discover or impede his movement. Orders were immediately issued for the removal of the baggage to Burlington. In order to deceive the enemy, the camp-fires along the Assanpink were brightly kindled and a guard left to keep them burning through the night. Then the army was put in motion by the circuitous route to Princeton. Everything was done in silence, and the British sentries walked their beats until the morning light showed them a deserted camp. Just then the roar of the American cannon, thirteen miles away, gave Cornwallis notice of how he had been outgeneralled. At sunrise Washington was entering Princeton. At the same moment the British regiments stationed there were marching out by the Trenton road to re-enforce Cornwallis. The Americans met them in the edge of the village, and the battle at once began. . . . The valor of Washington never shone with brighter lustre. He spurred among his flying men, who rallied at his call. He rode between the hostile lines, and reined his horse within thirty yards of the enemy's column. . . . [The British were defeated.]—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 40, p. 317.

5818. VICTORY, Genius for. Cromwell. Two thirds of the field were gained for Rupert and for Charles. Lord Fairfax was defeated. He fled through the field, through the hosts of the Cavaliers, who supposed him to be some Royalist general; he posted on to Cawood Castle, arrived there, and in the almost or entirely deserted house he unbooted and unsaddled himself, and went like a wise old soldier to bed. But amid all that rout, carnage, and flying confusion, one man held back his troops. Cromwell, there to the left, when he saw how the whole Royalist force attacked the centre, restrained the fiery impatience of his Ironsides; he drew them off still farther to the left; his eye blazed all on fire, till the moment he uttered his short, sharp, passionate word to the troops, "Charge, in the name of the Most High!" Beneath the clouds, beneath the storm, beneath the night heavens flying along, he scattered the whole mass. We know it was wondrous to see him in those moods of highly-wrought enthusiasm; and his watchword always struck along the ranks. "Truth and Peace!" he thundered along the lines; "Truth and Peace!" in answer to the Royalist cries of "God and the King!" "Upon them—upon them!" That hitherto almost unknown man and his immortal hosts of Puritans poured upon the Cavaliers. The air was alive with artillery. Cromwell seized the very guns of the Royalists, and turned them upon themselves. Thus, when the Royalists returned from the scattering the one wing of their foes, they found the ground occupied by victors. The fight was fought again, but fought in vain; in vain was Rupert's rallying cry, "For God and for the King!"—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 8, p. 115.

5819. ——. Cæsar. [At the siege of Alesia immense armies gathered against him.] Out of the 60,000 that had sallied forth in the morning, all but a draggled remnant lay dead on the hill-sides. Seventy-four standards were brought to Cæsar. The besieged retired into Alesia again in despair. The vast hosts that were to have set them free melted away. In the morning they were streaming over the country, making back for their homes, with Cæsar's cavalry behind them, cutting them down and capturing them in thousands. The work was done. The most daring feat in the military annals of mankind had been successfully accomplished. A Roman army which could not at the utmost have amounted to 50,000 men had held blockaded an army of 80,000—not weak Asiatics, but European soldiers, as strong and as brave individually as the Italians were; and they had defeated, beaten, and annihilated another army which had come expecting to overwhelm them, five times as large as their own.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 19.

5820. VICTORY, Honorable. Alexander. In the month of September there happened an eclipse of the moon, about the beginning of the festival of the great mysteries at Athens. The eleventh night after that eclipse the two armies being in view of each other, Darius kept his men under arms, and took a general review of his troops by torchlight. Meantime Alexander suffered his Macedonians to repose themselves, and with his soothsayer Aristander performed some private ceremonies before his tent, and offered sacrifices to Fear. The oldest of his friends, and Parmenio in particular, when they beheld the plain between Niphates and the Gordæan Mountains all illumined with the torches of the Barbarians, and heard the tumultuary and appalling noise from their camp, like the bellowings of an immense sea, were astonished at their numbers, and observed among themselves how arduous an enterprise it would be to meet such a torrent of war in open day. They waited upon the king, therefore, when he had finished the sacrifice, and advised him to attack the enemy in the night, when darkness would hide what was most dreadful in the combat. Upon which he gave them that celebrated answer, "I will not steal a victory."—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

5821. VICTORY, Inexpensive. Battle of Dunbar. Terrible was the awakening of the Scottish soldiers; and their matches all out; the battle-cry rushed along the lines—"The Covenant! The Covenant!" but it soon became more and more feeble, while yet high and strong, amid the war of the trumpets and the musketry, arose the watchword of Cromwell: "The Lord of Hosts! The Lord of Hosts!" The battle-cry of Luther was in that hour the charging word of the English Puritans. Terrible! but short as terrible! Cromwell had seized the moment and the place,

The hour and the man met there; in overthrowing the one flank of the enemy's line, he made them the authors of their own defeat. A thick fog, too, had embarrassed their movements; their very numbers became a source of confusion. But now over St. Abb's Head the sun suddenly appeared, crimsoning the sea, scattering the fogs away. The Scottish army were seen flying in all directions—flying, and so brief a fight! "They run!" said Cromwell; "I protest they run!" and catching inspiration, doubtless, from the bright shining of the daybeam, "Inspired," says Mr. Forster, "by the thought of a triumph so mighty and resistless, his voice was again heard, 'Now let God arise, and let His enemies be scattered!'" It was a wonderful victory—wonderful even among wonderful triumphs! To hear the shout sent up by the united English army; to see the general make a halt, and sing the one hundred and seventeenth psalm upon the field. Wonderful that that immense army should thus be scattered—10,000 prisoners taken, about 3000 slain, 200 colors, 15,000 stand of arms, and all the artillery!—and that Cromwell should not have lost of his army twenty men!—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 12, p. 154.

5822. ——. Cæsar's. The most remarkable feature in Cæsar's campaigns, and that which indicates most clearly his greatness as a commander, was the smallness of the number of men that he ever lost, either by the sword or by wear and tear. No general was ever so careful of his soldiers' lives.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 14.

5823. VICTORY, Inglorious. Commodus. We read that Commodus descended, sword in hand, into the arena against a wretched gladiator, armed only with a foil of lead, and, after shedding the blood of the helpless victim, struck medals to commemorate the inglorious victory.—MACAULAY'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, p. 56.

5824. VICTORY, Miraculous. Apparently. [Clovis, the] victorious king of the Franks, proceeded without delay to the siege of Angoulême. At the sound of his trumpets the walls of the city imitated the example of Jericho, and instantly fell to the ground; a splendid miracle, which may be reduced to the supposition that some clerical engineers had secretly undermined the foundations of the rampart.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 38, p. 585.

5825. VICTORY, Moderation in. General Grant. Grant, with true delicacy of feeling, refused to be present at the terrible humiliation of his foe [surrender of General Lee]. . . . Governed by the same feelings, he made no victorious entrance into the Confederate capital.—HEADLEY'S GRANT, p. 233.

5826. VICTORY, Opportunity for. Alfred the Great. The Saxons were reduced to such despair that many left their country, fled into the mountains of Wales, or escaped beyond sea. Alfred himself was obliged to relinquish his crown. He concealed himself in the habit of a peasant, and lived for some time in the house of a neatherd. . . . A chief of Devonshire, a man of great spirit and valor, had, with a handful of his followers, routed a large party of Danes, and taken a consecrated or enchanted standard, in which they reposed the utmost confidence. Alfred, observing this symptom of reviving spirit in his subjects, left his retreat; but before having recourse to arms, he resolved to inspect himself the situation of the enemy. Assuming the disguise of a harper, he passed without suspicion into the Danish camp, where his music and drolery obtained him so favorable a reception that he was kept there for several days, and even lodged in the tent of their prince. Here, having remarked their careless security, their contempt of the English, and their own real weakness, he immediately, by private emissaries, summoned a rendezvous of the bravest of the Saxon nobles.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 5, p. 108.

5827. VICTORY a Preparation. Napoleon I. "Such a rapid succession of brilliant victories," said Las Casas to Napoleon at St. Helena, "filling the world with your fame, must have been a source of great delight to you." "By no means," Napoleon replied; "they who think so know nothing of the peril of our situation. The victory of to-day was instantly forgotten in preparation for the battle which was to be fought on the morrow. The aspect of danger was before me. I enjoyed not one moment of peace."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 5.

5828. VICTORY presumed. Pompey. After one doubtful engagement, in which the advantage was rather on the side of Pompey, [Julius] Caesar led him on to Macedonia, where he had two additional legions under his lieutenant Calvinus. Pompey, who was easily elated with every appearance of success, flattered himself that this was a retreat upon the part of his enemy. He was, therefore, anxious to come up with him, and eager to terminate the war by a general engagement. This was exactly what Caesar wished. This important battle was fought in the field of Pharsalia. The army of Pompey amounted to 45,000 foot and 7000 horse, which was more than double that of his rival; and so confident of victory were the former, that they had adorned their tents with festoons of laurel and myrtle, and prepared a splendid banquet against their return from the battle. Vain and presumptuous preparations! Of this immense army, 15,000 were left dead on the field and 24,000 surrendered themselves prisoners of war, and cheerfully incorporated themselves into the army of the victor, whose loss, in all, did not exceed 200 men. Caesar found in the camp of Pompey all his papers, containing the correspondence he carried on with the chief of his partisans at Rome. The sagacious and magnanimous chief committed them unopened to the flames, declaring that he wished rather to be ignorant who were his enemies than be obliged to punish them.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 2, p. 409.

5829. VICTORY, An unfortunate. Battle of Manassas. The justice of history compels us to state that two causes—the overweening confidence of the South in the superior valor of its people, induced by the unfortunate victory at Manassas, and the vain delusion . . . that European interference was certain, and that peace was near at hand—conspired about this time [close of 1861] to reduce the Southern cause to a critical condition of apathy.—POLLARD'S FIRST YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 8, p. 210.

5830. VICTORY, Victims of. Indians. [John Donelson, the father of General Jackson's wife, and other pioneer emigrants were floating down the Tennessee River, seeking homes in the wilderness.] On board one boat, containing twenty-eight persons, the small-pox raged. As this boat always sailed at a certain distance behind the rest, it was attacked by Indians, who captured it, killed all the men, and carried off the women and children. The Indians caught the small-pox, of which some hundreds died in the course of the season.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 533.

5831. VILLAINY, Reward of. Titus Oates. On the day in which he was brought to the bar, Westminster Hall was crowded with spectators, among whom were many Roman Catholics, eager to see the misery and humiliation of their persecutor. A few years earlier his short neck, his legs uneven as those of a badger, his forehead low as that of a baboon, his purple cheeks, and his monstrous length of chin, had been familiar to all who frequented the courts of law. He had then been the idol of the nation. Wherever he had appeared men had uncovered their heads to him. The lives and estates of the magnates of the realm had been at his mercy. Times had now changed; and many who had formerly regarded him as the deliverer of his country shuddered at the sight of those hideous features on which villainy seemed to be written by the hand of God.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 4, p. 448.

5832. VINDICATION, Audacious. Bothwell. [He directed the assassins of Darnley, Queen Mary's despised husband. They assassinated him that Bothwell might take his place.] Bothwell was accused of regicide before the judges of Edinburgh, at the instance of the Earl of Lennox, the king's father. The favorite, with undaunted audacity, supported by the queen and by the troops devoted, as usual, to the reigning power, appeared in arms before the judges, and insolently exacted from them an acquittal. The same day he rode forth, mounted on one of Darnley's favorite horses, which the people recognized with horror bearing his murderer. The queen saluted him from her balcony with a gesture of encouragement and tenderness.—LAMARTINE'S MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 30.

5833. VINDICTIVENESS, Prelatical. Archbishop Sharpe. [Archbishop Sharpe was shot at in Scotland, and afterward recognized his would-be assassin. His name was Mitchel. After being tortured by the "iron boot," he was brought before the council, and after a solemn promise that his life should be spared, confessed his guilt. The council doomed him to perpetual imprisonment on the Bass Rock. [Three or four years later] it was determined to bring him to trial. He was brought to Edinburgh, and his own confession was urged against him. The promise on which that confession was extorted was suppressed. The archbishop denied it. The council books were not allowed to be produced. The man was convicted. A distinct record of the promise was found in the council books immediately after conviction, yet he was executed. Burnet says: "It was such a combination of treachery, perjury, and cruelty as the like had perhaps not been known."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 21, p. 348.

5834. VIOLENCE, Error of. Christiana. The successful example of Luther gave rise to reformers of different kinds, and among the rest two fanatics of Saxony, whose names were Stork and Muncer, pretended to reform both the Catholics and the Lutherans. It was their notion that the gospel gave them a warrant for propagating their tenets by force of arms, which they grounded on these words of Scripture: "I am come not to send peace, but a sword." They condemned the baptism of infants, and rebaptized their disciples when they were come to the age of manhood, whence they got the name of Anabaptists. They preached up an universal equality among mankind, and strenuously contended both for religious and civil liberty; but it was their error to be too violent. They had not strength to support their sanguinary notion of converting men by the sword; and after committing some horrible outrages, they were defeated by the regular troops of the empire, and Muncer and several of his associates had their heads cut off upon a scaffold at Mulhausen.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 297.

5835. VIRGINITY dedicated. Pulcheria. Pulcheria, the sister of Theodosius, . . . received, at the age of sixteen, the title Augusta. . . . She continued to govern the Eastern empire near forty years: during the long minority of her brother, and after his death in her own name, and in the name of Marcian, her nominal husband. From a motive either of prudence or religion, she embraced a life of celibacy; and notwithstanding some aspersions on the chastity of Pulcheria, this resolution, which she communicated to her sisters Arcadia and Marina, was celebrated by the Christian world as the sublime effort of heroic piety. In the presence of the clergy and people the three daughters of Arcadius dedicated their virginity to God; and the obligation of their solemn vow was inscribed on a tablet of gold and gems, which they publicly offered in the great church of Constantinople. Their palace was converted into a monastery; and all males, except the guides of their conscience, the saints who had forgotten the distinction of sexes, were scrupulously excluded from the holy threshold. Pulcheria, her two sisters, and a chosen train of favorite damsels formed a religious community; they renounced the vanity of dress; interrupted, by frequent fasts, their simple and frugal diet; allotted a portion of their time to works of embroidery, and devoted several hours of the day and night to the exercises of prayer and psalmody. The piety of a Christian virgin was adorned by the zeal and liberality of an empress. Ecclesiastical history describes the splendid churches which were built at the expense of Pulcheria in all the provinces of the East; her charitable foundations for the benefit of strangers and the poor; the ample donations which she assigned for the perpetual maintenance of monastic societies, and the active severity with which she labored to suppress the opposite heresies of Nestorius and Eutyches.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 32, p. 367.

5836. VIRGINITY, Faith in. Joan of Arc. [After her capture by the British she was tried by the University of Paris as a sorceress. They were under restraint because of her professed virginity.] They pronounced as their opinion that it was lawful to have recourse to the young maiden. The Archbishop of Embrun, who had been consulted, pronounced similarly, supporting his opinion by showing how God had frequently revealed to virgins—for instance, to the sibyls—what he concealed from men; how the demon could not make a covenant with a virgin; and recommending it to be ascertained whether Jehanne were a virgin. Thus, being pushed to extremity, and either not being able or being unwilling to explain the delicate distinction betwixt good and evil revelations, knowledge humbly referred a ghostly matter to a corporeal test, and made this grave question of the spirit depend on woman's mystery. As the doctors could not decide, the ladies did; and the honor of the Pucelle was vindicated by a jury, with the good Queen of Sicily, the king's mother-in-law, at their head.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 10.

5837. VIRGINITY, Sacred. Joan of Arc. She was said to be a virgin, and it was a notorious and well-ascertained fact that the devil could not make a compact with a virgin. The coolest head among the English, Bedford, the regent, resolved to have the point cleared up; and his wife, the duchess, intrusted the matter to some matrons, who declared Jehanne to be a maid—a favorable declaration, which turned against her, by giving rise to another superstitious notion—to wit, that her virginity constituted her strength, her power, and that to deprive her of it was to disarm her, was to break the charm, and lower her to the level of other women.—MICHELET'S JOAN OF ARC, p. 52.

5838. VIRTUE, False. Wife of Constantine. They ascribe the misfortunes of Crispus to the arts of his stepmother, Fausta, whose implacable hatred, or whose disappointed love, renewed in the palace of Constantine the ancient tragedy of Hippolitus and of Phædra. Like the daughter of Minos, the daughter of Maximian accused her son-in-law of an incestuous attempt on the chastity of his father's wife, and easily obtained, from the jealousy of the emperor, a sentence of death against a young prince whom she considered with reason as the most formidable rival of her own children. But Helena, the aged mother of Constantine, lamented and revenged the untimely fate of her grandson Crispus; nor was it long before a real or pretended discovery was made, that Fausta herself entertained a criminal connection with a slave belonging to the imperial stables.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 18, p. 162.

5839. VIRTUE, Political. Reign of James II. Rochester was lord lieutenant of Hertfordshire. All his little stock of virtue had been expended in his struggle against the strong temptation to sell his religion for lucre. He was still bound to the court by a pension of £4000 a year, and in return for this pension he was willing to perform any service, however illegal or degrading, provided only that he were not required to go through the forms of a reconciliation with Rome. He had readily undertaken to manage his country; and he exerted himself, as usual, with indiscreet heat and violence. But his anger was thrown away on the sturdy squires to whom he addressed himself. They told him with one voice that they would send up no man to Parliament who would vote for taking away the safeguards of the Protestant religion.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 302.

5840. VIRTUE, Protection of. Capture of Rome. A Roman lady, of singular beauty and orthodox faith, had excited the impatient desires of a young Goth, who, according to the sagacious remark of Sozomen, was attached to the Arian heresy. Exasperated by her obstinate resistance, he drew his sword, and, with the anger of a lover, slightly wounded her neck. The bleeding heroine still continued to brave his resentment and to repel his love, till the ravisher desisted from his unavailing efforts, respectfully conducted her to the sanctuary of the Vatican, and gave six pieces of gold to the guards of the church, on condition that they should restore her inviolate to the arms of her husband.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3, p. 285.

5841. VIRTUE, Public. Pertinax. [When Pertinax was raised to the throne of the Roman Empire] he found a nobler way of condemning his predecessor's memory, by the contrast of his own virtues with the vices of Commodus. On the day of his accession he resigned over to his wife and son his whole private fortune, that they might have no pretence to solicit favors at the expense of the State. He refused to flatter the vanity of the former with the title of Augusta, or to corrupt the inexperienced youth of the latter by the rank of Cæsar. Accurately distinguishing between the duties of a parent and those of a sovereign, he educated his son with a severe simplicity, which, while it gave him no assured prospect of the throne, might in time have rendered him worthy of it. In public the behavior of Pertinax was grave and affable. He lived with the virtuous part of the Senate (and, in a private station, he had been acquainted with the true character of each individual), without either pride or jealousy; considered them as friends and companions, with whom he had shared the dangers of the tyranny, and with whom he wished to enjoy the security of the present time. He very frequently invited them to familiar entertainments, the frugality of which was ridiculed by those who remembered and regretted the luxurious prodigality of Commodus.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 4, p. 119.

5842. VIRTUE, Severity in. Stoics. The virtue of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus was of a severe and laborious kind. It was the well-earned harvest of many a learned conference, of many a patient lecture, and many a midnight lucubration. At the age of twelve years he embraced the rigid system of the Stoics, which taught him to submit his body to his mind, his passions to his reason; to consider virtue as the only good, vice as the only evil, all things external as things indifferent. His meditations, composed in the tumult of a camp, are still extant; and he even condescended to give lessons of philosophy, in a more public manner than was perhaps consistent with the modesty of a sage or the dignity of an emperor. But his life was the noblest commentary on the precepts of Zeno. He was severe to himself, indulgent to the imperfection of others, just and beneficent to all mankind.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 3, p. 95.

5843. VIRTUE, Superior. Phocion. He was one of the greatest men that Greece ever produced, in whose person every kind of merit was united. He had been educated in the school of Plato and Xenocrates, and formed his manners upon the most perfect plan of pagan virtue, to which his conduct was always conformable. It would be difficult for any person to carry disinterestedness higher than this extraordinary man, which appeared from the extreme poverty in which he died, after the many great offices he had filled. How many opportunities of acquiring riches has a general always at the head of armies, who acts against rich and opulent enemies; sometimes in countries abounding with all things, and which seem to invite the plunderer! But Phocion would have thought it infamous had he returned from his campaigns laden with any acquisition but the glory of his exalted actions and the grateful benedictions of the people he had spared.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 16, § 5.

5844. VIRTUE, Uncertain. Samuel Johnson. I asked whether a man naturally virtuous, or one who has overcome wicked inclinations, is the best. JOHNSON: "Sir, to you, the man who has overcome wicked inclinations is not the best. He has more merit to himself; I would rather trust my money to a man who has no hands, and so a physical impossibility to steal, than to a man of the most honest principles. There is a witty satirical story of Foote. He had a small bust of Garrick placed upon his bureau. 'You may be surprised,' said he, 'that I allow him to be so near my gold; but you will observe he has no hands.'"—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 499.

5845. VISION, Fanciful. Phantom City. [Solyman, an Ottoman emir, was made ruler of the ancient Mysia, where also were the ruins of the once opulent city of Cyzicus.] One night that Solyman, seated on the brink of the sea, was contemplating, in a solemn mood, these ruins of temples and of palaces, illuminated like fantastic monuments by the glimmering light of a moon in its first quarter, a transparent mist, rolled along by the north wind, came to diffuse itself upon these ruins, and to impress upon them, by its undulations, the appearance of life and movement. He fancied that the phantom city was shaking off its shroud and lifting itself out of its sepulchre. The murmuring of the waves at his feet, augmenting the illusion, seemed like the hum of a great city when awaking in the morning. He called to mind that prophetic moon which, issuing formerly in a dream from the side of Edebal, and representing the beautiful and prolific Malkatoun, had appeared to his grandsire Otham in the gorges of Phrygia. This second apparition of the moon, illuminating at the same time Asia and Europe in a scene of such solemnity, appeared to him a confirmation of the promise made his forefather, and a reproach of the temporization of his father Orkhan. Thus the credulous simplicity of the shepherd is always blended in the Turk with the heroism of a warrior. The East has dreams in all its histories. It is a moon that conducts the Ottomans first to Phrygia, then to Europe.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 229.

5846. VISION, Horrible. Marcus Brutus. A little before he left Asia he was sitting alone in his tent, by a dim light, and at a late hour. The whole army lay in sleep and silence, while the general, wrapped in meditation, thought he perceived something enter his tent; turning toward the door, he saw a horrible and monstrous spectre standing silently by his side. "What art thou?" said he, boldly; "art thou god or man? And what is thy business with me?" The spectre answered, "I am thy evil genius, Brutus! Thou wilt see me at Philippi." To which he calmly replied, "I'll meet thee there." When the apparition was gone, he called his servants, who told him they had neither heard any noise nor had seen any vision.—PLUTARCH'S MARCUS BRUTUS.

5847. VISION, Spiritual. Swedenborg. There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body; and, as a consequence, there is a natural sight, and there is a spiritual sight. . . . Now, it is possible for the spiritual body to be raised partially above the natural body, without causing death, or the entire withdrawal of its life from the natural body. This partial withdrawal of the spiritual body, and the enjoyment of sight in the spiritual world, is what is meant by the opening of the spiritual sight.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 8, p. 71.

5848. VISION of War. Hannibal. His strong sense of being the devoted instrument of his country's gods to destroy their enemies haunted him by night as they possessed him by day. In his sleep, so he told Silenus, he fancied that the supreme god of his fathers had called him into the presence of all the gods of Carthage, who were sitting on their thrones in council. There he received a solemn charge to invade Italy; and one of the heavenly council went with him and with his army, to guide him on his way. He went on, and his divine guide commanded him, "See that thou look not behind thee!" But after a while, impatient of the restraint, he turned to look back; and there he beheld a huge and monstrous form, thick set all over with serpents; wherever it moved orchards and woods and houses fell crashing before it. He asked his guide in wonder what that monster form was. The god answered, "Thou seest the desolation of Italy; go on thy way, straight forward, and cast no look behind."—ARNOLD'S HANNIBAL, p. 7.

5849. VISIONS, Effective. Joan of Arc. One summer's day, a fast-day, Jeanne being at noon-tide in her father's garden, close to the church, saw a dazzling light on that side, and heard a voice say, "Jeanne, be a good and obedient child; go often to church." The poor girl was exceedingly alarmed. Another time she again heard the voice and saw the radiance; and in the midst of the effulgence noble figures, one of which had wings, and seemed a wise prud'homme. "Jeanne," said this figure to her, "go to the succor of the King of France, and thou shalt restore his kingdom to him." She replied, all trembling, "Messire, I am only a poor girl; I know not how to ride or lead men-at-arms." The voice replied, "Go to M. de Baudricourt, captain of Vaucouleurs, and he will conduct thee to the king. St. Catharine and St. Marguerite will be thy aids." She remained stupefied and in tears, as if her whole destiny had been revealed to her. The prud'homme was no less than St. Michael, the severe archangel of judgments and of battles. He reappeared to her, inspired her with courage, and told her "the pity for the kingdom of France." Then appeared sainted women, all in white, with countless lights around, rich crowns on their heads, and their voices soft and moving unto tears; but Jeanne shed them much more copiously when saints and angels left her. "I longed," she said, "for the angels to take me away, too."—MICHELET'S JOAN, p. 5.

5850. VISIONS, Fictitious. Siege of Constantinople. [By Amurath II.] The strength of the walls resisted an army of 200,000 Turks. . . . The enthusiasm of the dervish, who was snatched to heaven in visionary converse with Mahomet, was answered by the credulity of the Christians, who beheld the Virgin Mary, in a violet garment, walking on the rampart and animating their courage.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65, p. 285.

5851. VISITOR, Welcome. Lafayette. Great was the joy of the American people in the summer of 1824. The venerated Lafayette, now aged and gray, returned once more to visit the land for whose freedom he had shed his blood. The honored patriots who had fought by his side came forth to greet him. The younger heroes came forth to greet him. In every city and on every battle-field which he visited he was surrounded by a throng of shouting freemen. His journey through the country was a triumph. It was a solemn and sacred moment when he stood alone by the grave of Washington. Over the dust of the great dead the patriot of France paid the homage of his tears. In September of 1825 he bade a final adieu to the people who had made him their guest, and then sailed for his native land. At his departure the frigate Brandywine—a name significant for him—was prepared to bear him away.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 52, p. 422.

5852. VOICE, A powerful. Colonel Henry Knox. He had one excellent quality of an artillery officer—a voice of stentorian power. When General Washington crossed the Delaware, Colonel Knox, it is said, was of the greatest assistance, from the fact that his orders could be heard from one side of the river to the other.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 460.

5853. VOICE, Training of. Demosthenes. The hesitation and stammering of his tongue he corrected by practising to speak with pebbles in his mouth; and he strengthened his voice by running or walking up-hill, and pronouncing some passage in an oration or poem during the difficulty of breath which that caused. He had, moreover, a looking-glass in his house, before which he used to declaim and adjust all his motions.—PLUTARCH'S DEMOSTHENES.

5854. VOICE, Well-preserved. Old Age. [When Rev. John Wesley was seventy years old he preached in a magnificent natural amphitheatre at Gwennap to more than 30,000 people, by whom he was easily heard in the still evening.]—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 119.

5855. VOTE, Only one. Oliver Cromwell. [He was returned to Parliament from the borough of Huntingdon.] He took his seat in the fourth Parliament of Charles I. for Cambridge. His election was most obstinately contested, and he was returned at last by the majority of a single vote; his antagonist was Cleaveland, the poet. "That vote," exclaimed Cleaveland, "hath ruined both Church and kingdom!"—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 4, p. 82.

5856. VOTE, Power of one. Sparta. Sparta enjoyed a longer period of prosperous duration than any other State of antiquity. So long as her original constitution remained inviolate, which was for the period of several centuries, the Lacedæmonians were a virtuous, a happy, and a respectable people. Frugality, we know, was the soul of Lycurgus' establishment. The luxurious disposition of a single citizen introduced the poison of corruption. Lysander, whose military talents raised his country to a superiority over all the Grecian States, sent home, after the conquest of Athens, the wealth of that luxurious republic to Lacedæmon. It was debated in the Senate whether it should be received; the best and wisest of that order considered it as a most dangerous breach of the institutions of their legislator; but others were dazzled with the lustre of that gold, with which they were, till now, unacquainted, and the influence of Lysander prevailed for its reception. It was decreed to receive the money for the use of the State, while it was at the same time declared a capital crime for any of it to be found in the possession of a private citizen—a weak resolution, which in effect was consecrating and making respectable in the eyes of the citizens that very thing of which it was necessary to forbid them to aspire at the possession. . . . A single voice in the Senate, perhaps, decided the fate of that illustrious commonwealth. Had there been one other virtuous man, whose negative would have caused the rejection of that pernicious measure, Sparta might have continued to exist for ages frugal, warlike, virtuous, and uncorrupted.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 6, p. 471.

5857. ———. Battle of Marathon. One officer in the council of war had not yet voted. This was Callimachus, the war-ruler. The votes of the generals were five and five, so that the voice of Callimachus would be decisive. On that vote, in all human probability, the destiny of all the nations of the world depended. Militiades turned to him, and in simple soldierly eloquence . . . the great Athenian thus adjured his countrymen to vote for giving battle: "It now rests with you, Callimachus, either to enslave Athens, or, by assuring her freedom, to win yourself an immortality of fame, such as not even Harmodius and Aristogeiton have acquired; for never, since the Athenians were a people, were they in such danger as they are in at this moment. If they bow the knee to these Medes, they are to be given up to Hippias, and you know what they then will have to suffer. But if Athens comes victorious out of this contest, she has it in her to become the first city of Greece. Your vote is to decide whether we are to join battle or not. If we do not bring on a battle presently, some factious intrigue will disunite the Athenians, and the city will be betrayed to the Medes. But if we fight before there is anything rotten in the State of Athens, I believe that, provided the gods will give fair play and no favor, we are able to get the best of it in an engagement." The vote of the brave war-ruler was gained; the council determined to give battle.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 15.

5858. VOTES, Soliciting. William W. Grenville. [Candidate for House of Commons.] We were sitting, . . . the two ladies and myself, . . . in our snug parlor, one lady knitting, the other netting, and the gentlemen winding worsted, when to our unspeakable surprise a mob appeared before the window; a smart rap was heard at the door, the boys bellowed, and the maid announced Mr. Grenville. Puss was unfortunately let out of her box, so that the candidate, with all his good friends at his heels, was refused admittance at the grand entry, and referred to the back door, as the only possible way of approach. . . . I told him I had no vote, for which he readily gave me credit. I assured him I had no influence, which he was not equally inclined to believe, and the less, no doubt, because Mr. Ashburner, the draper, addressing himself to me at this moment, informed me that I had a great deal. . . . Thus ended the conference. Mr. Grenville squeezed me by the hand again, kissed the ladies, and withdrew. He kissed, likewise, the maid in the kitchen, and seemed, upon the whole, a most loving, kissing, kind-hearted gentleman. [William Cowper's letter to Rev. John Newton.]—SMITH'S COWPER, ch. 7.

5859. VOTING for Christ. Roman Senate. In a full meeting of the [Roman] Senate, the emperor proposed, according to the forms of the republic, the important question, Whether the worship of Jupiter or that of Christ should be the religion of the Romans. The liberty of suffrages, which he affected to allow, was destroyed by the hopes and fears that his presence inspired; and the arbitrary exile of Symmachus was a recent admonition that it might be dangerous to oppose the wishes of the monarch. On a regular division of the Senate, Jupiter was condemned and degraded by the sense of a very large majority. [A.D. 388.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 28, p. 187.

5860. VOW of Gratitude. Abraham Lincoln. Immediately after the battle of Antietam . . . [the President said to his Cabinet:] "The time for the annunciation of the Emancipation policy could no longer be delayed." Public sentiment, he thought, would sustain it; many of his warmest friends and supporters demanded it, and he had promised his God that he would do it. . . . "I made a solemn vow before God that if General Lee were driven back from Pennsylvania I would crown the result by the declaration of freedom to the slaves."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 765.

5861. VOW, A sudden. Martin Luther. Another circumstance happened which hastened his decision to seek his soul's salvation in the monastic holiness recommended by the church. He had been on a visit to his parents. On his return to the university he had reached the village of Stotternheim, near Erfurt, when a furious thunderstorm burst over him, and he fell frightened to the earth, crying out, "Deliver me, St. Ann, and I will become a monk." Though he regretted having made this vow, he felt himself bound to keep it. And this impelled him to monkhood, for, as he said himself, he never could find comfort in his Christian baptism, and was always much concerned to obtain the favor of God through his own piety.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 3, p. 29.

5862. VOWS, Forced. Convent. [Matilda became the wife of Henry I. of England.] Matilda appeared before his court to tell her tale in words of passionate earnestness. She had been veiled in her childhood, she asserted, only to save her from the insults of the rude soldiery who infested the land; had flung the veil from her again and again, and had yielded at last to the unwomanly taunts, the actual blows of her aunt. "As often as I stood in her presence," the girl pleaded, "I wore the veil, trembling as I wore it with indignation and grief. But as soon as I could get out of her sight I used to snatch it from my head, fling it on the ground, and trample it under foot. That was the way, and none other, in which I was veiled." Anselm at once declared her free from conventual bonds, and the shout of the English multitude when he set the crown on Matilda's brow drowned the murmur of churchman or of baron.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 117.

5863. VOWS, Religious. In Sickness. In 1244 Louis IX. . . . was reduced to the borders of the grave. While lying in this desperate condition at the château of Pontoise, and expecting each moment to be his last, he demanded of his attendants a crucifix, which he placed upon his breast, and sunk immediately into a state of death-like lethargy. This was the crisis of the disease. To the astonishment and joy of all, the danger passed, and from that hour Louis began to recover. It soon transpired that in his extremity he had solemnly vowed that, should his life be spared, he would proceed on a crusade to the Holy Land.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 4.

5864. — — —. Columbus. [See No. 5865.] The tempest still raging with unabated violence, the admiral and all the mariners made a vow that, if spared, wherever they first landed they would go in procession barefooted and in their shirts to offer up prayers and thanksgivings in some church dedicated to the Holy Virgin. Besides these general acts of propitiation, each one made his private vow, binding himself to some pilgrimage or vigil or other rite of penitence and thanksgiving at his favorite shrine. The heavens, however, seemed deaf to their vows; the storm grew still more wild and frightful, and each man gave himself up for lost.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 5, ch. 2.

5865. — — —. Columbus. [On his return voyage a terrific storm threatened the destruction of all.] Seeing all human skill baffled and confounded, Columbus endeavored to propitiate heaven by solemn vows and acts of penance. By his orders a number of beans, equal to the number of persons on board, were put into a cap, on one of which was cut the sign of the cross. Each of the crew made a vow that should he draw forth the marked bean he would make a pilgrimage to the shrine of Santa Maria de Guadalupe, bearing a wax taper of five pounds' weight. The admiral was the first to put in his hand, and the lot fell upon him. From that moment he considered himself a pilgrim, bound to perform the vow. [The storm continued. See No. 5864.]—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 5, ch. 2.

5866. VOWS, Unjust. Are null. [A Bedouin woman, mounted on a dromedary, ran toward Mahomet.] "The enemy," said she, "have seized upon my flock, that I was pasturing in the desert; I mounted this dromedary, and made a vow to immolate it in your presence to God should I succeed in escaping through its speed. I come to fulfil the vow." "But," said the prophet, smiling, "would it not be ingratitude to the generous animal to whom thou owest thy safety? Thy vow is null, because it is unjust; the animal which thou hast consecrated to me is thine no more, it is mine; I gave it in trust to thee; go and console thy family."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 121.

5867. VOYAGE, A celebrated. Greeks. The Argonauts, under the command of Jason, set sail from the coast of Thessaly. Their expedition was lengthened by unfavorable weather, unskillful seamen, and the consequent necessity of keeping as near as possible to the coasts. . . . The outlines of their expedition may be very shortly detailed. From the isle of Lemnos, where they made some stay, they proceeded to Samothrace. Thence sailing round the Chersonesus, they entered the Hellespont; keeping along the coast of Asia, touched at Cyzicus, and spent some time on the coast of Bithynia; thence they entered the Thracian Bosphorus, and proceeding onward through the Euxine, at length discovered Caucasus at its eastern extremity. This mountain was their landmark, which directed them to the port of Phasis near to Oea, then the chief city of Colchis, which was the ultimate object of their voyage. Following the Argonauts through this tract of sea, and coasting it as they must have done, it appears evident that they performed a voyage of at least four hundred and forty leagues. Those who considered not the times and the circumstances in which the Greeks accomplished this navigation, have not perceived the boldness of the enterprise. These daring Greeks had been but recently taught the art of sailing, by the example of foreigners; it was their first attempt to put it in practice. They were utterly ignorant of navigation as a science, and they went to explore an extent of sea that was altogether unknown to them. Let us do those heroes justice, and freely acknowledge that the voyage of the Argonauts was a noble enterprise for the times in which it was executed. [B.C. 1280, Usher's Chronology.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 8, p. 71.

5868. VOYAGE, Preparation for a. Church. [Jacques Cartier ascended the St. Lawrence on a voyage of discovery.] In the following spring three ships lay in the harbor of St. Malo, ready for a voyage of discovery. In those simple old days no man was audacious enough to venture out upon the broad ocean without first going to church and commending his soul and his enterprise to God; and the man who, on his return home, neglected to repair instantly to church to offer thanks, was regarded as a graceless wretch. This custom prevailed as late as a hundred years ago in almost all countries, and still prevails in some Catholic nations. So, brave Captain Cartier and his companions went in solemn procession to the Cathedral of St. Malo, where the bishop said mass, and gave them his parting benediction.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 371.

5869. WAGES advanced. Reign of Charles II. In the course of a hundred and twenty years the daily earnings of the bricklayer have risen from half a crown to four and tenpence, those of the mason from half a crown to five and threepence, those of the carpenter from half a crown to five and fivepence, and those of the plumber from three shillings to five and sixpence. It seems clear, therefore, that the wages of labor, estimated in money, were, in 1685, not more than half of what they now are; and there were few articles important to the workingman of which the price was not, in 1685, more than half of what it now is. Beer was undoubtedly much cheaper in that age than at present.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 390.

5870. WAGES, Exorbitant. So called. Knyghton, a chronicler of the time, . . . mentions as exorbitant wages a shilling a day with his food, to a mower, and eightpence a day to a reaper. . . . The shilling a day was equal to fifteen shillings of our present money. . . . Five-pence was equal to half a bushel of wheat.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 30, p. 472.

5871. WAGES, Legal. Reign of Charles II. About the beginning of the year 1685 the justices of Warwickshire, in the exercise of a power intrusted to them by an act of Elizabeth, fixed, at their quarter sessions, a scale of wages for their county, and notified that every employer who gave more than the authorized sum, and every workingman who received more, would be liable to punishment. The wages of the common agricultural laborer, from March to September, they fixed at the precise sum mentioned by [Sir William] Petty—namely, four shillings a week without food. From September to March the wages were to be only three and sixpence a week.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 386.

5872. WAGES by Popularity. Charioteer's. [Early in the sixth century] games were exhibited at the expense of the republic, the magistrates, or the emperors; but the reins were abandoned to servile hands; and if the profits of a favorite charioteer sometimes exceeded those of an advocate, they must be considered as the effects of popular extravagance and the high wages of a disgraceful profession.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 56.

5873. WAGES, Small. Fifteenth Century. The summer wages of the free-mason and master carpenter, of five and one quarter pence without food, were reduced to fourpence in the winter. The lower artificers and laborers, who received three and one quarter pence in the summer without meat and drink, were to serve for three-pence in the winter. [A. D. 1450–1485. Multiplying these amounts by fifteen—the supposed relation of present to ancient money-value—we have the amount in money of to-day.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 7, p. 114.

5874. — —. Reign of Charles II. Sir William Petty, whose mere assertion carries great weight, informs us that a laborer was by no means in the lowest state who received for a day's work fourpence with food, or eightpence without food. Four shillings a week, therefore, were, according to Petty's calculation, fair agricultural wages.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 386.

5875. — —. Thirteenth Century. The domestic servants of the [Bishop] Swinfield establishments were fed, clothed, and lodged.

They received in addition half-yearly wages. The confidential members of the household, who were of gentle blood, with names derived from places, received ten shillings. . . . There were two clerks, probably lay, at half a crown. The highest-paid servant was John the farrier, at half these wages. John the carter, Robert the carter, Harpin the falconer, and William the porter had each three and fourpence. Ywon (Evan) the launder, Thomas the palfreyman, and Robert the butler had each half a crown; and so had John the messenger.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 26, p. 398.

5876. WALKING, Benefit of. Alexander. This lady [Ada], as a testimony of the deep sense she had of the favors received from Alexander, sent him every day meats dressed in the most exquisite manner; delicious pastry of all sorts; and the most excellent cooks of every kind. Alexander answered the queen on this occasion, "that all this train was of no service to him, for that he was possessed of much better cooks, whom Leonidas his governor had given him; one of whom prepared him a good dinner, and that was, walking a great deal in the morning very early; and the other prepared him an excellent supper, and that was, dining very moderately."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 4.

5877. WANTS, Fewness of. Diogenes. Alexander, attended by all his courtiers, made him a visit. The philosopher was at that time lying down in the sun; but seeing so great a crowd of people advancing toward him, he sat up, and fixed his eyes on Alexander. This prince, surprised to see so famous a philosopher reduced to such extreme poverty, after saluting him in the kindest manner, asked whether he wanted anything. Diogenes replied: "Yes, that you would stand a little out of my sunshine." This answer raised the contempt and indignation of all the courtiers; but the monarch, struck with the philosopher's greatness of soul: "Were I not Alexander," says he, "I would be Diogenes." A very profound sense lies hid in this expression, which shows perfectly the bent and disposition of the heart of man. Alexander is sensible that he is formed to possess all things; such is his destiny, in which he makes his happiness consist; but then, in case he should not be able to compass his ends, he is also sensible that to be happy, he must endeavor to bring his mind to such a frame as to want nothing. In a word, all or nothing presents us with the true image of Alexander and Diogenes. How great and powerful soever that prince might think himself, he could not on this occasion deny himself to be inferior to a man to whom he could give, and from whom he could take, nothing.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 2.

5878. WAR, Ancestors' Love of. Early Englishmen. They were at heart fighters, and their world was a world of war. Tribe warred with tribe, and village with village; even within the township itself feuds parted household from household, and passions of hatred and vengeance were handed on from father to son. Their mood was, above all, a mood of fighting men, venturesome, self-reliant, proud, with a dash of hardness and cruelty in it, but ennobled by the virtues which spring from war, by personal courage and loyalty to plighted word, by a high and stern sense of manhood and the worth of man. A grim joy in hard fighting was already a characteristic of the race. War was the Englishman's "shield-play" and "sword-game;" the gleeman's verse took fresh fire as he sang of the rush of the host and the crash of the shield-line. Their arms and weapons, helmet and mailshirt, tall spear and javelin, sword and seax, the short, broad dagger that hung at each warrior's girdle, gathered to them much of the legend and the art which gave color and poetry to the life of Englishmen.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 22.

5879. WAR by Avarice. East Indian. It was one of the charges of "high crimes and misdemeanors" against Warren Hastings [Governor of Bengal] that he entered into a private engagement with the nabob of Oude, "to furnish him, for a stipulated sum of money, to be paid to the East India Company, with a body of troops for the declared purpose of thoroughly extirpating the nation of the Rohillas—a nation from whom the company had never received, or pretended to receive or apprehend, any injury whatever."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 7, p. 125.

5880. WAR, Aversion toward. General Grant. [When he visited Germany, Bismarck regretted the emperor's illness did not permit his majesty to review his soldiers in person.] General Grant accepted the crown prince's invitation to a review for next morning, but with a smile continued: "The truth is, I am more a farmer than a soldier. I take little or no interest in military affairs; and although I entered the army thirty-five years ago, and have been in two wars—in Mexico as a young lieutenant, and later—I never went into the army without regret, and never retired without pleasure."—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 225.

5881. WAR, Beginning of. American Revolution. About midnight the [British,] under command of Colonel Smith and Major Pitcairn, set out for Concord. The people of Boston, Charlestown, and Cambridge were roused by the ringing of bells and the firing of cannons. Two hours before the vigilant Joseph Warren had despatched William Dawes and Paul Revere to ride with all speed to Lexington and to spread the alarm through the country. Against two o'clock in the morning the minute-men were under arms, and a company of a hundred and thirty had assembled on the common at Lexington. The patriots loaded their guns, and stood ready; but no enemy appeared, and it was agreed to separate until the drum-beat should announce the hour of danger. At five o'clock the British van, under command of Pitcairn, came in sight. The provincials, to the number of seventy, reassembled; Captain Parker was their leader. Pitcairn rode up, and exclaimed: "Disperse, ye villains! Throw down your arms, ye rebels, and disperse!" The minute-men stood still; Pitcairn discharged his pistol at them, and with a loud voice cried, "Fire!" The first volley of the Revolution whistled through the air, and sixteen of the patriots—nearly a fourth of the whole number—fell dead or wounded. The rest fired a few random shots, and dispersed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 38, p. 297.

5882. WAR, Beneficial. To National Character. [William Pitt, in Parliament, on continuing the Seven Years' War.] "This war, though it has cut deep into our pecuniary means, has augmented our military faculties. Set that against the debt—that spirit which has made us what we are." [The debt had been increased sixty millions. Knight says a compensation for the burden of a great debt is made] when a nation is awakened by war out of a degraded condition; when the principle of an exalted patriotism and a generous loyalty takes the place of a venal self-seeking and a miserable abnegation of public duty.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 16, p. 255.

5883. WAR, Blessings of. National Progress. For three years after the fall of Montreal the war between France and England lingered on the ocean. The English fleets were everywhere victorious. On the 10th of February, 1763, a treaty of peace was made at Paris. All the French possessions in North America eastward of the Mississippi, from its source to the river Iberville, and thence through Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain to the Gulf of Mexico, were surrendered to Great Britain. At the same time Spain, with whom England had been at war, ceded East and West Florida to the English Crown. As reciprocal with this provision, France was obliged to make a cession to Spain of all that vast territory west of the Mississippi known as the province of Louisiana. By the sweeping provisions of the treaty, the French king lost his entire possessions in the new world. Thus closed the French and Indian war, one of the most important in the history of mankind. By this conflict it was decided that the decaying institutions of the Middle Ages should not prevail in the West, and that the powerful language, laws, and liberties of the English race should be planted forever in the vast domains of the New World.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 35, p. 279.

5884. WAR, Brutality in. Pillage of Magdeburg. [By the army of Wallenstein.] Here commenced a scene of horrors for which history has no language, poetry no pencil. Neither innocent childhood nor helpless old age—neither youth, sex, rank, nor beauty could disarm the fury of the conquerors. Wives were abused in the arms of their husbands, daughters at the feet of their parents; and the defenceless sex exposed to the double sacrifice of virtue and life. No situation, however obscure or however sacred, escaped the rapacity of the enemy. In a single church fifty-three women were found beheaded. The Croats amused themselves with throwing children into the flames: Pappenheim's Walloons with stabbing infants at the mother's breast. Some officers of the League, horror-struck at this dreadful scene, ventured to remind [General] Tilly that he had it in his power to stop the carnage. "Return in an hour," was his answer; "I will see what I can do; the soldier must have some reward for his danger and toils." . . . In less than twelve hours this strong, populous, and flourishing city, one of the finest in Germany, was reduced to ashes, with the exception of two churches and a few houses, . . . the living crawling from under the dead, children wandering about with heartrending cries, calling for their parents, and infants still sucking the breasts of their lifeless mothers. More than six thousand bodies were thrown into the Elbe to clear the streets; a much greater number had been consumed by the flames. The whole number of the slain was reckoned at not less than thirty thousand.—THIRTY YEARS' WAR, § 282.

5885. ——. Indiscriminate. A dreadful massacre followed in the streets of Paris on the night of the 12th of June [1418]; the Constable d'Armagnac, several prelates, and numbers of the nobility were cruelly murdered; and the mob, breaking open the prisons, butchered indiscriminately all that they contained. The cut-throat Cabochiens reappeared, and for three days Paris was given up to atrocities too revolting to bear recital. The ruffians cut strips of flesh from the bleeding bodies of the Armagnacs, in brutal derision of the scarf or band which symbolized their party. The numbers of the slain were estimated at near three thousand.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 10, § 12.

5886. WAR, Burden of. Continuous. [A hundred years after the Seven Years' War two shillings a head was paid annually by every one of the twenty-five millions of the British population] toward the perpetual burden of taxation created by that war. [The same burden continues to this day.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 16, p. 258.

5887. WAR, Small Cause of. An Ear. [In 1731 Captain Robert Jenkins testified that he was boarded by a Spanish guarda costa not far from Havana.] No contraband goods were found. He was threatened with death if he did not confess where his gold and unlawful merchandise was hidden. The Spaniards slashed him with their cutlasses; they hung him up to the yard-arm. Before he was quite exhausted they let him down, and again bade him confess. He spoke of his Britannic Majesty's flag, of the high seas, in a mild assertion of the injustice he was receiving. His ear had been half cut off when the ship was boarded; and now the miscreants tore the ear out of his head, exclaiming, "Carry that to your king." The ear of Jenkins drove England to war.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 6, p. 93.

5888. WAR, Causes of the. Rebellion. First, the different construction put upon the national constitution by the people of the North and the South. . . . Second, the different system of labor in the North and in the South. . . . The invention of the cotton-gin, . . . which added a thousand millions of dollars to the revenue of the South. . . . Slave labor became important and slaves valuable. . . . The Missouri agitation, . . . because of the proposed rejection of Missouri as a slave-holding State. . . . The nullification acts of South Carolina. . . . The annexation of Texas, with the consequent enlargement of the domain of slavery. . . . The Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed. Thereby the Missouri Compromise was repealed. Third, the want of intercourse between the people of the North and the South. The great railroads and thoroughfares ran east and west. . . . Fourth, the publication of sectional books. Fifth, the evil influence of demagogues, . . . the leadership of bad men.—RIDPATR'S U. S., ch. 62.

5889. WAR, Civil. John Cantacuzeni. [The Greek regent.] Near six years the flame of discord burnt with various success and unabated rage: the cities were distracted by the faction of the nobles and the plebeians—the Cantacuzeni and Palæologi; and the Bulgarians, the Servians, and the Turks were invoked on both sides as the instruments of private ambition and the common ruin. The regent deplored the calamities of which he was the author and victim; and his own experience might dictate a just and lively remark on the different nature of foreign and civil war. "The former," said he, "is the external warmth of summer, always tolerable, and often beneficial; the latter is the deadly heat of a fever, which consumes without a remedy the vitals of the constitution."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 63, p. 188.

5890. WAR, Civilization by. Britain. That the first real civilizer of Britain was the military arm, is evident from every incidental relation of the Roman conquest.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 3, p. 36.

5891. WAR, Compensations of. Thirty Years'. Fearful indeed and destructive was the first movement in which this general political sympathy announced itself; a desolating war of thirty years, which, from the interior of Bohemia to the mouth of the Scheldt, and from the banks of the Po to the coasts of the Baltic, devastated whole countries, destroyed harvests, and reduced towns and villages to ashes; which opened a grave for many thousand combatants, and for half a century smothered the glimmering sparks of civilization in Germany, and threw back the improving manners of the country into their pristine barbarity and wildness. Yet out of this fearful war Europe came forth free and independent. In it she first learned to recognize herself as a community of nations; and this intercommunion of States, which originated in the Thirty Years' War, would alone be sufficient to reconcile the philosopher to its horrors. All this was effected by religion. Religion alone could have rendered possible all that was accomplished, but it was far from being the sole motive of the war. Had not private advantages and State interests been closely connected with it, vain and powerless would have been the arguments of theologians; and the cry of the people would never have met with princes so willing to espouse their cause, nor the new doctrines have found such numerous, brave, and persevering champions.—THIRTY YEARS' WAR, § 3.

5892. WAR, Contempt of. Hangman-in-Chief. [Charles Mordaunt, Earl of Peterborough, the successful commander of the allied expedition against Spain, afterward looked with contempt upon his military vocation.] He said: "A general is only a hangman-in-chief."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 19, p. 298.

5893. WAR, Cruelties of. Scotland. The . . . exploits of Surrey in Scotland are thus recorded in a letter of Wolsey: "The Earl of Surrey so devastated and destroyed all Tweeddale and March, that there is left neither house, fortress, village, tree, cattle, corn, nor other succor for man; insomuch that some of the people that fled from the same, afterward returning and finding no sustenance, were compelled to come into England begging bread, which oftentimes when they do eat they die incontinently for the hunger passed. And with no imprisonment, cutting off their ears, burning them in the faces, or otherwise, can be kept away."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 18, p. 299.

5894. WAR, Cruelty in. Timour the Tartar. [Timour did not] forget that dream of all conquerors, India. He overran it this time from the Indus to Delhi, from the ocean to Thibet. His army marched with a people of slaves in its train, the prize of his first victories, and who might compromise him in other battles. An atrocious order delivered one hundred thousand of them to death in a single night. Each Tartar soldier was constrained to immolate his portion with his own hand. Remorse, pity, indignation, seized the army. The imans presaged the wrath of Heaven. Timour responded to this revolt of conscience of his warriors only by the conquest and massacre of Delhi.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 315.

5895. ———. Antioch. Mameluke Emir Bibars rapidly reduced the principal Latin fortresses, and on the 29th of May, 1268, planted his standards on the walls of Antioch. The fall of this capital was fatal to the Christian power; 17,000 of the inhabitants were massacred, and upward of 100,000 sold into slavery.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 6, p. 172.

5896. WAR, Declaration of. Ambassador. [The Roman ambassador went to Carthage.] Their orders were simply to demand that Hannibal and his principal officers should be given up for their attack upon the allies of Rome, in breach of the treaty, and, if this were refused, to declare war. The Carthaginians tried to discuss the previous question, whether the attack on Saguntum was a breach of the treaty; but to this the Romans would not listen. At length M. Fabius gathered up his toga, as if he were wrapping up something in it, and holding it out thus together, he said: "Behold, here are peace and war; take which you choose!" The Carthaginian suffete, or judge, answered: "Give whichever thou wilt." Hereupon Fabius shook out the folds of his toga, saying: "Then here we give you war;" to which several members of the council shouted in answer, "With all our hearts we welcome it." Thus the Roman ambassador left Carthage, and returned straight to Rome.—ARNOLD'S HANNIBAL, p. 6.

5897. WAR degraded. A Trade. In the purer ages of the commonwealth the use of arms was reserved for those ranks of citizens who had a country to love, a property to defend, and some share in enacting those laws which it was their interest as well as duty to maintain. But in proportion as the public freedom was lost in extent of conquest, war was gradually improved into an art, and degraded into a trade.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 1, p. 10.

5898. WAR, Destructive. Cæsar's. Plutarch tells us that in the course of this extraordinary contest, which lasted eight years, Cæsar took by force more than 800 towns, subdued 300 distinct tribes or states, and conquered 3,000,000 of fighting men, of whom 1,000,000 perished on the field of battle, and another million were sold into slavery.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 1, § 8, p. 10.

5899. ———. Of Life. [At the battle of Châlons, by Attila against Theodoric, the] number of the slain amounted to 162,000, or, according to another account, 300,000 persons; and these incredible exaggerations suppose a real and effective loss sufficient to justify the historian's remark, that whole generations may be swept away, by the madness of kings, in the space of a single hour.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 35, p. 446.

5900. ———. Bonaparte's. From September, 1805, to the 15th of November (1814), the Senate had given Bonaparte authority to devote to what was called the glory of France no less a number than 2,103,000 of her sons.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 31, p. 568.

5901 WAR, Emblem of. Indian. Other chiefs followed the example of the great sachem, and entered into friendly relations with the [Plymouth] colony. Nine of the leading tribes acknowledged the sovereignty of the English king. One chieftain threatened hostilities, but Standish's army obliged him to beg for mercy. Canonicus, king of the Narragansetts, sent to William Bradford, who had been chosen governor after the death of Carver, a bundle of arrows wrapped in the skin of a rattlesnake; but the undaunted governor stuffed the skin with powder and balls, and sent it back to the chief, who did not dare to accept the dangerous challenge. The hostile emblem was borne about from tribe to tribe, until finally it was returned to Plymouth.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13, p. 124.

5902. WAR absurdly ended. Treaty of Ghent. There never was a more absurd treaty than that of Ghent. Its only significance was that Great Britain and the United States, having been at war, agreed to be at peace. Not one of the distinctive issues to decide which the war had been undertaken was settled, or even mentioned. Of the impressment of American seamen not a word was said. The wrongs done to the commerce of the United States were not referred to. The rights of neutral nations were left as undetermined as before. Of "free-trade and sailors' rights," which had been the battle-cry of the American navy, no mention was made. The principal articles of the compact were devoted to the settlement of unimportant boundaries and the possession of some petty islands in the Bay of Passamaquoddy. There is little doubt, however, that at the time of the treaty Great Britain gave the United States a private assurance that impressment and the other wrongs complained of by the Americans should be practised no more. For the space of sixty years vessels bearing the flag of the United States have been secure from such insults as caused the war of 1812. Another advantage gained by America was the recognition of her naval power. It was no longer doubtful that American sailors were the peers in valor and patriotism of any seamen in the world.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 51, p. 415.

5903. WAR, Enemies in. Hunger. Barbarossa's army of Crusaders did not come home again, any more than Barbarossa. They were stronger than Turk and Saracen, but not than hunger and disease. Leaders did not know then, as our little friend at Berlin came to know, that "an army, like a serpent, goes upon its belly." After fine fighting and considerable victories, the end of this Crusade was, it took to "besieging Acre," and, in reality, lay perishing, as of murrain, on the beach at Acre, without shelter, without medicine, without food. Not even Richard Cœur de Lion and his best pro-ess and help could avert such issue from it.—CARLYLE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT, Book 2, ch. 6, p. 83.

5904. WAR, Famine by. The Innocent. [In 1418, during the siege of Rouen, the population were shut up for twenty weeks. Famine came. An English chronicler writes:] And ever they of the town hoped to have been rescued, but it would not be; and many hundreds died for hunger, for they had eaten all the cats, horses, hounds, rats, mice, and all that might be eaten; and oft-times the men-at-arms driving out the poor people at the gates of the city, for spending of victual, anon our men drove them in again; and young children lay dead in the streets, hanging on the dead mothers' paps, that pity was to see.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 5, p. 70.

5905. WAR, Famous in. William of Normandy. "No knight under heaven," his enemies owned, "was William's peer." Boy as he was at Val-ès-dunes, horse and man went down before his lance. All the fierce gayety of his nature broke out in the warfare of his youth, in his rout of fifteen Angevins with but five men at his back, in his defiant ride over the ground which Geoffrey Martel claimed from him—a ride with hawk on fist, as if war and the chase were one. No man could bend William's bow. His mace crashed its way through a ring of English warriors to the foot of the standard. He rose to his greatest height at moments when other men despaired. His voice rang out as a trumpet when his soldiers fled before the English charge at Senlac, and his rally turned the flight into a means of victory.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 107.

5906. WAR futile. England and Spain. The bells were ringing in October, 1739, upon the declaration of hostilities against Spain. They were ringing in April, 1748, upon the conclusion of the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, by which not a single point was gained for which England had been fighting with Spain and France for eight years. [England declared the war.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 12, p. 181.

5907. ———. "Seven Years'." [On the 15th of February, 1763, peace was concluded between the Empress Maria Theresa, the Elector of Saxony, and the King of Prussia. The Seven Years' War ended by replacing the parties to this great quarrel in the exact position in regard to territory in which they stood before its commencement.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 16, p. 257.

5908. WAR, Glory in. American Indians. War alone was the avenue to glory. All other employment seemed unworthy of human dignity; in warfare against the brute creation, but still more against man, they sought liberty, happiness, and renown; thus was gained an honorable appellation, while the mean and obscure among them had not even a name.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 22.

5909. WAR vs. Gospel. Massachusetts. [In the summer of 1622 a company of immigrants began a new settlement called Weymouth.] Instead of working with their might to provide against starvation, they wasted the fall in idleness, and attempted to keep up their stock of provisions by defrauding the Indians. Thus provoked to hostility, the natives formed a plan to destroy the colony; but Massasoit, faithful to his pledges, went to Plymouth and revealed the plot. Standish marched to Weymouth at the head of his regiment, now increased to eight men, attacked the hostile tribe, killed several warriors, and carried home the chief's head on a pole. The tender-hearted John Robinson wrote from Leyden: "I would that you had converted some of them before you killed any."—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13, p. 125.

5910. WAR for Honor. Trojan War. The immediate cause of the war is generally allowed to have been the rape of Helen, the wife of Menelaus, by Paris, the son of Priam, King of Troy; although prior to that motive an animosity had subsisted between the Greeks and Trojans for many generations. It is not otherwise probable that a quarrel which interested only Menelaus and his brother Agamemnon should have been readily espoused by all the princes of Greece. The preparations for this war are said to have occupied no less than ten years, a length of time which ought not to surprise us, when we consider that this was the first war in which the whole nation had engaged.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 8, p. 76.

5911. WAR, Incapacity for. Lord Loudoun. Ever since the treaty of Utrecht the French had retained Cape Breton; and the fortress at Louisbourg had been made one of the strongest on the continent. On the 20th of June Lord Loudoun sailed from New York, with an army of 6000 regulars. By the 1st of July he was at Halifax, where he was joined by Admiral Holburn, with a powerful fleet of sixteen men-of-war. There were on board 5000 additional troops fresh from the armies of England. Never was such a use made of a splendid armament. Loudoun landed before Halifax, cleared off a mustering plain, and set his officers to drilling regiments already skilled in every manœuvre of war. To heighten the absurdity, the fields about the city were planted with onions, for it was said that the men might take a scurvy. By and by the news came that the French vessels in the harbor of Louisbourg outnumbered by one the ships of the English squadron. To attack a force that seemed superior to his own was not a part of Loudoun's tactics. Ordering the fleet to go cruising around Cape Breton, he immediately embarked with his army, and sailed for New York. Arriving at this place, he proposed to his officers to fortify Long Island, in order to defend the continent against an enemy whom he outnumbered four to one.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 34, p. 269.

5912. WAR, Inhumanity in. Romans. [The Goths had been driven by the Romans to the defences of Ravenna.] These fortifications were, indeed, impregnable to the assault of art or violence; and when Belisarius invested the capital he was soon convinced that famine only could tame the stubborn spirit of the Barbarians. The sea, the land, and the channels of the Po were guarded by the vigilance of the Roman general; and his morality extended the rights of war to the practice of poisoning the waters and secretly firing the granaries of a besieged city.—GRIBON'S ROME, ch. 63, p. 179.

5913. WAR, Injury by. Civil. The effect of the constant progress of wealth has been to make insurrection far more terrible to thinking men than maladministration : . . wealth would be exposed to imminent risk of spoliation and destruction. Still greater would be the risk to public credit, on which thousands of families directly depend for subsistence, and with which the credit of the whole commercial world is inseparably connected. It is no exaggeration to say that a civil war of a week on English ground would now produce disasters which would be felt from the Hoang-Ho to the Missouri, and of which the traces would be discernible at the distance of a century.—MACAULAY'S HIST., ch. 1, p. 33.

5914. WAR, Instinct for. Napoleon I. There is still preserved upon the island of Corsica, as an interesting relic, a small brass cannon, weighing about thirty pounds, which was the early and favorite plaything of Napoleon. Its loud report was music to his childish ears. In imaginary battle he saw whole squadrons mowed down by the discharges of his formidable piece of artillery.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 1.

5915 WAR, Love of. Lord Nelson. [During the battle of Copenhagen, Nelson's most terrible conflict, he] was waiking the quarter-deck, which was slippery with blood and covered with the dead, who could not be removed as fast as they fell. . . . He looked upon the devastation around him, and sternly smiling, said, "This is warm work, and this day may be the last to any of us in a moment. But mark me, I would not be elsewhere for thousands." This was heroic, but it was not noble.—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 22.

5916. — — —. Franks. Although they were strongly actuated by the allurements of rapine, they professed a disinterested love of war, which they considered as the supreme honor and felicity of human nature; and their minds and bodies were so completely hardened by perpetual action, that, according to the lively expression of an orator, the snows of winter were as pleasant to them as the flowers of spring.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 20, p. 239.

5917. — — —. The Alani. [A people who inhabited the deserts of Scythia.] The mixture of Samatic and German blood had contributed to improve the features of the Alani. . . . They considered war and rapine as the pleasure and the glory of mankind. A naked cimeter fixed in the ground was the only object of their religious worship; the scalps of their enemies formed the costly trappings of their horses; and they viewed with pity and contempt the pusillanimous warriors who patiently expected the infirmities of age.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 26, p. 25.

5918. WAR, Miseries of. Battle of Fredericksburg. Little children with blue feet trod painfully over the frozen ground, and those whom they followed knew as little as themselves where to seek food and shelter. Hundreds of ladies wandered homeless over the frozen highway with bare feet and thin clothing, knowing not where to find a place of refuge. Delicately nurtured girls, with slender forms, upon which no rain had beat, which no wind had ever visited too roughly, walked hurriedly, with unsteady feet, upon the road, seeking only some place where they could shelter themselves. Whole families sought sheds by the wayside, or made roofs of fence-rails and straw, not knowing whither to fly.—POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, ch. 6, p. 190.

5919. — — —. Desolation. There is a letter . . . dated from Bologna, December 12, 1530, which presents as striking a picture as was ever drawn of the widespread misery produced by the contests of ambition. In travelling fifty miles they saw no creature stirring in rural industry, except three women gathering grapes rotting upon the vines. In Pavia the children were crying about the streets for bread. There was neither horse meat nor man's meat to be found. "There is no hope [for] many years that Italia shall be restored, for want of people."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 20, p. 330.

5920. WAR, Monument of. "Heads." Timour the Tartar erected on the ruins of Bagdad a pyramid of ninety thousand heads; again visited Georgia, and encamped on the banks of the Araxes.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65, p. 263.

5921. WAR, Murderous. Battle of Towton. [In 1461,] on the eve of Palm Sunday, began the cruel battle of Towton, at four o'clock, when the armies [of the Yorkists and Lancastrians] joined. Through all the night, amid a fall of snow, these fierce men madly fought till the afternoon of the next day. Then 33,000 men lay dead on the field of battle. . . . It is affirmed that there was no quarter given in the battle. . . . The triumph of the Yorkists was complete.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 9, p. 148.

5922. WAR, Partisan. Cæsar and Pompey. [See No. 4230.] They were now declared enemies, and each prepared to assert, by arms, his title to an unrestrained dominion over his country. It is not a little surprising that the citizens of Rome should deliberately prepare to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in the decision of such a contest, with all the zeal of men who fight for their most valuable rights and possessions.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 2, p. 406.

5923. WAR, Patriotism in. Defensive. [The threatened invasion of England by the Spanish Armada, and the conflicts which followed the dispersion of that immense and powerful fleet, proved to be beneficial to the nation.] There was a higher result of such a warfare than the taking of ships and the burning of towns. A grand spirit of devotion to their country was engendered in the people. The energies called forth in that stirring time produced a corresponding elevation of the national character.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 15, p. 239.

5924. — — —. American Revolution. Where eminent statesmen hesitated, the instinctive action of the multitude revealed the counsels of magnanimity. . . . A nation without union, without magazines and arsenals, without a treasury, without credit, without government, fought successfully against the whole strength and wealth of Great Britain. An army of veteran soldiers capitulated to insurgent husbandmen.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 1.

5925. WAR, Piety in. Joan of Arc. At the sight of the Holy Maid and her banner they rallied and renewed the assault. Joan rode forward at their head, waving her banner and cheering them on. The English quailed at what they believed to be the charge of hell ; Saint Loup was stormed, and its defenders put to the sword, except some few whom Joan succeeded in saving. All her woman's gentleness returned when the combat was over. It was the first time that she had ever seen a battle-field. She wept at the sight of so many bleeding corpses ; and her tears flowed doubly when she reflected that they were the bodies of Christian men who had died without confession.—DECISIVE BATTLES, § 383.

5926. WAR, Politicians in. Romans. To draw him into more open ground, Cæsar had shifted his camp continually. Pompey had followed cautiously, still remaining on his guard. His political advisers were impatient of these dilatory movements. They taunted him with cowardice. They insisted that he should set his foot on this insignificant adversary promptly and at once ; and Pompey, gathering courage from their confidence, and trusting to his splendid cavalry, agreed at last to use the first occasion that presented itself. . . . [Pompey's] beaten army, which a few hours before were sharing in imagination the lands and offices of their conquerors, fled out through the opposite gates, throwing away their arms, flinging down their standards, and racing, officers and men, for the rocky hills which at a mile's distance promised them shelter.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 22.

5927. WAR prayed for. Its Miseries. In 1514 Lord Dacre, describing the "robbing, spoiling, and vengeance in Scotland," [adds,] "which I pray our Lord God to continue." [Thus men appealed to the Author of all good in support of their perpetration of all evil.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 274.

5928. WAR, Propensity for. American Indians. Next among the propensities of the red men was the passion for war. Their wars, however, were always undertaken for the redress of grievances, real and imaginary, and not for conquest. But with the Indian a redress of grievances meant a personal, vindictive, and bloody vengeance on the defender. The Indian's principles of war were easily understood, but irreconcilable with justice and humanity. The forgiveness of an injury was reckoned a weakness and a shame. Revenge was considered among the nobler virtues. The open honorable battle of the field was an event unknown in Indian warfare. Fighting was limited to the surprise, the ambushade, the massacre ; and military strategy consisted of cunning and treachery. Quarter was rarely asked and never granted ; those who were spared from the fight were only reserved for a barbarous captivity, ransom or the stake. In the torture of his victims all the diabolical ferocity of the savage warrior's nature burst forth without restraint.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 1, p. 44.

5929. WAR, Romance in. Thirty Years' War. Duke Christian, passionately enamored of the Electress Palatine, with whom he had become acquainted in Holland, and more disposed for war than ever, led back his army into Lower Saxony, bearing that princess' glove in his hat, and on his standards the motto, "All for God and Her."—THIRTY YEARS' WAR, § 174.

5930. WAR of the Roses. England. [The Duke of York claimed the succession to the English throne, which the House of Lords promised at the death of King Henry.] But the open display of York's pretensions at once united the partisans of the royal house in a vigorous resistance ; and the deadly struggle which received the name of the Wars of the Roses from the white rose which formed the badge of the house of York, and the red rose which was the cognizance of the house of Lancaster, began in a gathering of the north round Lord Clifford and of the west round Henry, Duke of Somerset.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 449.

5931. WAR for Spoils. Athenians. One day Agesilaus ordered his commissaries to sell the prisoners, but to strip them first. Their clothes found many purchasers ; but as to the prisoners themselves, their skins being soft and white by reason of their having lived so much within doors, the spectators only laughed at them, thinking they would be of no service as slaves. Whereupon Agesilaus, who stood by at the auction, said to his troops ; "These are the persons whom you fight with ;" and then pointing to the rich spoils, "Those are the things ye fight for."—PLUTARCH'S AGESILAUS.

5932. WAR, Study of. Honorable. Antigonus being asked who was the greatest general, answered, "Pyrrhus would be, if he lived to be old." Antigonus, indeed, spoke only of the generals of his time ; but Hannibal said that, of all the world had ever beheld, the first in genius and skill was Pyrrhus, Scipio the second, and himself the third. . . . This was the only science he applied himself to ; this was the subject of his thoughts and conversation ; for he considered it as a royal study, and looked upon other arts as mere trifling amusements. And it is reported that when he was asked whether he thought Python or Cæphias the best musician, "Polysperchon," said he, "is the general ;" intimating that this was the only point which it became a king to inquire into or know.—PLUTARCH'S PYRRHUS.

5933. WAR, Sufferers by. The Innocent. [In 1070 William the Conqueror destroyed the country for a hundred miles about York.] Malmesbury, writing half a century afterward, says : "Thus the resources of a province, once flourishing, were cut off, by fire, slaughter, and devastation. The ground for more than sixty miles, totally uncultivated and unproductive, remains bare to the present day." Ordericus winds up the lamentable story with these words : "There followed consequently so great a scarcity in England in the ensuing years, that severe famine involved the innocent and unarmed population in so much misery, that . . . more than a hundred thousand souls of both sexes perished of want."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 14, p. 193.

5934. WAR, Supplies in. Second Crusade. The army was reviewed near to Nicæa, where it was found to consist of 600,000 foot, including women, and 100,000 horse. We have no accounts transmitted to us how such multitudes procure subsistence when once they had come into a hostile country. It is difficult to conceive that they could have procured it by plunder without such a total dispersion as must have rendered all their enterprises ineffectual against such a formidable enemy as the Mohammedans. . . . It is highly probable that the greatest part of the calamities and misfortunes which the Crusaders underwent must have arisen from a scarcity of provisions.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 9, p. 176.

5935. WAR, Solitary Survivor of. *Afghan. [In 1841 a British army was sent into Afghan, where, after a complete success, it was placed in great peril by the treachery of the natives. A retreat was finally begun, and of 4500 soldiers only one was brought in to Jelalabad, and he wounded and exhausted. It was Dr. Brydon.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 25, p. 458.

5936. WAR, Terrors of Civil. *To Wellington. [The Duke of Wellington said in Parliament on the 4th of April, 1829:] My Lords, I am one of those who have passed a longer period of my life engaged in war than most men, and principally, I may say, in civil war; and I must say this, that if I could avoid by any sacrifice whatever even one month of civil war in the country to which I am attached, I would sacrifice my life in order to do it. I say that there is nothing that destroys property and prosperity and demoralizes character to the degree that civil war does; by it the hand of man is raised against his neighbor, against his brother, and against his father; the servant betrays his master, and the whole scene ends in confusion and devastation.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 8, ch. 13, p. 239.

5937. WAR, Toleration in. *Mahometan. [When Abou-Bekr, the successor of Mahomet, was about to march his Arabian warriors into Syria, he gathered them round him in a circle.] "Warriors of Islam," said he, "attend a moment, and listen well to the precepts which I am about to promulge to you for observation in times of war. Fight with bravery and loyalty. Never use artifice or perfidy toward your enemies; do not mutilate the fallen; do not slay the aged, nor the children, nor the women; do not destroy the palm trees; do not burn the crops; do not cut the fruit trees; do not slaughter the animals, except what will be necessary for your nourishment. You will find upon your route men living in solitude, in meditation, in the adoration of God; do them no injury, give them no offence."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 158.

5938. WAR, Trained for. *Franks. The lofty stature of the Franks, and their blue eyes, denoted a Germanic origin; their close apparel accurately expressed the figure of their limbs; a weighty sword was suspended from a broad belt; their bodies were protected by a large shield; and these warlike Barbarians were trained, from their earliest youth, to run, to leap, to swim; to dart the javelin, or battle-axe, with unerring aim; to advance, without hesitation, against a superior enemy; and to maintain, either in life or death, the invincible reputation of their ancestors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 35, p. 429.

5939. WAR, Trophies of. *Ghastly. From the permanent conquest of Russia the Tartars made a deadly though transient inroad into the heart of Poland, and as far as the borders of Germany. The cities of Lublin and Cracow were obliterated; they approached the shores of the Baltic; and in the battle of Lignitz they defeated the dukes of Silesia, the Polish palatines, and the great master of the Teutonic order, and filled nine sacks with the right ears of the slain.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 64, p. 218.

5940. WAR, Uncertainties of. *Rebellion. Jefferson Davis had himself declared, . . . whenever the war should open, the North and not the South should be the field of battle. . . . L. P. Walker, the rebel secretary of war, had said . . . he would prophesy that the flag which now flaunts the breeze here would float over the dome of the old Capitol at Washington before the first of May, and that it might float eventually over Faneuil Hall itself.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 6, p. 178.

5941. ——. *American Revolution. Three days after his victory [at Trenton] Washington again crossed the Delaware, and took post at Trenton. . . . The British fell back from their outposts on the Delaware, and concentrated in great force at Princeton. Cornwallis took command in person, and resolved to attack and overwhelm Washington at Trenton. So closed the year. Ten days previously Howe only waited for the freezing up of the Delaware before taking up his quarters in Philadelphia. Now it was a question whether he would be able to hold a single town in New Jersey.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 39, p. 316.

5942. WAR un hindered. *King Philip's War. The Indians were not idle. "We will fight," said they, "these twenty years; you have houses, barns, and corn; we have now nothing to lose."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 12.

5943. WAR, Waste of. *Devastation. The Emperor Charles [V.], whose recent triumphs had inspired him with unbounded self-confidence, expressed the utmost disdain for the military resources and tactics of his adversary, and, vowing that he would bring the [Francis I.] King of France as low as the poorest gentleman in his dominions, he crossed the Var and invaded Provence, at the head of 50,000 men, on the 25th of July. The French army, led by the Constable Montmorency, took post at Avignon, which commands both the Rhone and the Durance. The population was ordered to retire into the fortified towns; property and provisions of all kinds were hastily withdrawn, and the entire district in the route of the advancing enemy was then mercilessly laid waste by the French themselves, so that Provence presented in the course of a few days the most deplorable spectacle of desolation. Flourishing towns—Grasse, Digne, Draguignan, Antibes, Toulon—were set on fire and reduced to ashes; the inhabitants fled to the mountains, where thousands perished from exposure, privation, and hunger. The march of the invaders was unopposed; but it became every day more and more difficult to subsist the troops, and on reaching Aix, the capital, where he had intended to take triumphant possession of the kingdom of Provence, Charles found it, to his great dismay, totally depopulated and abandoned; everything had been removed or destroyed that could be of the slightest use or value to a conqueror. Famine, and its never-failing consequence, contagious disease, soon made fearful havoc in the imperial ranks. It was attempted to besiege Arles and Marseilles; but in each case the assailants were beaten off with severe loss; and the emperor, hearing at this moment of the arrival of Francis on his intrenched camp before Avignon, and apprehending an attack with overwhelming numbers, reluctantly gave orders to commence a retreat.—STUDENTS' FRANCE.

5944. WAR, Wealth by. Peter Cooper. The war, however, was the beginning of his fortune. The supply of foreign merchandise being cut off, a great impulse was given to manufactures. Cloth, for example, rose to such an extravagant price that cloth factories sprang up everywhere, and there was a sudden demand for every description of cloth-making machinery. Peter Cooper, who possessed a fine genius for invention, invented a machine for shearing the nap from the surface of cloth. It answered its purpose well, and he sold it without delay to good advantage. Then he made another; and as often as he had one done, he would go to some cloth mill, explain its merits, and sell it. He soon had a thriving shop, where he employed several men, and he sold his machines faster than he could make them.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 572.

5945. WAR, Wounds in. Philip of Macedon. No warrior was ever bolder or more intrepid in fight. Demosthenes, who cannot be suspected of flattering him, gives a glorious testimony of him on this head; for which reason I will cite his own words. "I saw," says this orator, "this very Philip, with whom we disputed for sovereignty and empire—I saw him, though covered with wounds, his eyes struck out, his collar-bone broken, maimed both in his hands and feet, still resolutely rush into the midst of dangers, and ready to deliver up to fortune any other part of his body she might desire, provided he might live honorably and gloriously with the rest of it."—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 14, § 8.

5946. WARFARE, Unequal. American Revolution. During the summer [1776] Washington's forces were augmented to about 27,000 men; but the terms of enlistment were constantly expiring; sickness prevailed in the camp; and the effective force was but little more than half as great as the aggregate. On the other hand, Great Britain was making the vastest preparations. By a treaty with some of the petty German States, 17,000 Hessian mercenaries were hired to fight against America. George III. was going to quell his revolted provinces by turning loose upon them a brutal foreign soldiery; 25,000 additional English troops were levied; an immense squadron was fitted out to aid in the reduction of the colonies, and $1,000,000 were voted for the extraordinary expenses of the war department. By these measures the Americans were greatly exasperated.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 39, p. 308.

5947. WARNING of Danger. Richard I. [Richard the Lion.] The firmness of Hubert Walter had secured order in England, but over sea Richard found himself face to face with dangers which he was too clear-sighted to undervalue. Destitute of his father's administrative genius, less ingenious in his political conceptions than John, Richard was far from being a mere soldier. A love of adventure, a pride in sheer physical strength, here and there a romantic generosity jostled roughly with the craft, the unscrupulousness, the violence of his race; but he was at heart a statesman, cool and patient in the execution of his plans as he was bold in their conception. "The devil is loose; take care of yourself," Philip had written to John at the news of Richard's release.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 151.

5948. WARNINGS, Effective. Cæsar's. It was now eleven in the forenoon. Cæsar shook off his uneasiness, and rose to go. As he crossed the hall, his statue fell, and shivered on the stones. Some servants, perhaps, had heard whispers, and wished to warn him. As he still passed on, a stranger thrust a scroll into his hand, and begged him to read it on the spot. It contained a list of the conspirators, with a clear account of the plot. He supposed it to be a petition, and placed it carelessly among his other papers. The fate of the empire hung upon a thread, but the thread was not broken. As Cæsar had lived to reconstruct the Roman world, so his death was necessary to finish the work. [He was assassinated.]—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 27.

5950. WATCHFULNESS, Safety by. Tennessee Wilderness. Never has a settlement been so infested with hostile Indians as this. When Rachel Donelson [afterward the beloved wife of General Jackson], with her sisters and young friends, went blackberrying, a guard of young men, with their rifles loaded and cocked, stood guard over the surrounding thickets while the girls picked the fruit. It was not safe for a man to stoop over a potato to drink unless some one else was on the watch with his rifle in his arms; and when half a dozen men stood together, in conversation, they turned their backs to each other, all facing different ways, to watch for a lurking savage. So the Donelsons lived for eight years, and gathered about them more negroes, more cattle, and more horses than any other household in the settlement.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 534.

5951. WATCHMEN, Mistaken. American Revolution. Marching by way of Charlestown Neck, the provincials came, about eleven o'clock, to the eminence which they were instructed to fortify. Prescott and his engineer, Gridley, not liking the position of Bunker Hill, proceeded down the peninsular seven hundred yards to another height, afterward called Breed's Hill. The latter was within easy cannon range of Boston. On this summit a redoubt eight rods square was planned by the engineer, and there, from midnight to day-dawn, the men worked in silence. The British ships in the harbor were so near that the Americans could hear the sentinels on deck repeating the night call, "All is well." The works were not yet completed when morning revealed the new-made redoubt to the astonished British of Boston.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 38, p. 300.

5952. WATER, Need of. Kingdom. The most distinguished of his [Lycurgus'] ancestors was Sous, under whom the Lacedæmonians made the Helotes their slaves, and gained an extensive tract of land from the Arcadians. Of this Sous it is related that, being besieged by the Clitorians in a difficult post where there was no water, he agreed to give up all his conquests, provided that himself and all his army should drink of the neighboring spring. When these conditions were sworn to, he assembled his forces, and offered his kingdom to the man that would forbear drinking; not one of them, however, would deny himself.—PLUTARCH'S LYCURGUS.

5953. WATER, Overflow of. Alban Lake. Of the many springs, brooks, and lakes which Italy abounds with, some were dried up, and others but feebly resisted the drought; the rivers always low in the summer, then ran with a very slender stream. But the Alban Lake, which has its source within itself, and discharges no part of its water, being quite surrounded with mountains, without any cause, unless it was a supernatural one, began to rise and swell in a most remarkable manner, increasing until it reached the sides, and at last the very tops of the hills, all which happened without any agitation of its waters. For a while it was the wonder of the shepherds and herdsmen; but when the earth, which, like a mole, kept it from overflowing the country below, was broken down with the quantity and weight of water then descending like a torrent through the ploughed fields and other cultivated grounds to the sea, it not only astonished the Romans, but was thought by all Italy to portend some extraordinary event. [The oracles declared] that the city could never be taken until the waters of the Alban Lake, which had now forsaken their bed, and found new passages, were turned back, or so diverted as to prevent their mixing with the sea.—PLUTARCH'S CAMILLUS.

5954. WATERING-PLACES, Rustic. Reign of Charles II. When the court, soon after the Restoration, visited Tunbridge Wells, there was no town there; but within a mile of the spring rustic cottages, somewhat cleaner and neater than the ordinary cottages of that time, were scattered over the heath. Some of these cabins were movable, and were carried on sledges from one part of the common to another. To these huts men of fashion, wearied with the din and smoke of London, sometimes came in the summer to breathe fresh air, and to catch a glimpse of rural life. During the season a kind of fair was daily held near the fountain. The wives and daughters of the Kentish farmers came from the neighboring villages with cream, cherries, wheat ears, and quails. To chaffer with them, to flirt with them, to praise their straw hats and tight heels, was a refreshing pastime to voluptuaries sick of the airs of actresses and maids of honor. Milliners, toymen, and jewellers came down from London, and opened a bazaar under the trees. In one booth the politician might find his coffee and the London Gazette; in another were gamblers playing deep at basset; and on fine evenings the fiddlers were in attendance, and there were morris-dances on the elastic turf of the bowling green.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 322.

5955. WATERING-PLACES, Uninviting. Reign of Charles II. [At Bath Springs the rooms were small and] were uncarpeted, and were colored brown with a wash made of soot and small beer, in order to hide the dirt. Not a wainscot was painted. Not a hearth or chimney-piece was of marble. A slab of common freestone, and fire-irons which had cost from three to four shillings, were thought sufficient for any fireplace. The best apartments were hung with coarse woollen stuff, and were furnished with rush-bottomed chairs.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 323.

5956. WEAK destroyed. Ancient Germans. [The Heruli, who anciently inhabited the dark forests of Germany and Poland,] were a fierce people who disdained the use of armor, and who condemned their widows and aged parents not to survive the loss of their husbands or the decay of their strength.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 39, p. 16.

5957. WEAKNESS, Criminality of. Richard Cromwell. [When Richard Cromwell succeeded his father in the Protectorate of England, he did not bring his father's endowments with him. When the army began to evince a hostility toward Parliament the officers who were devoted to him urged him to adopt some strong measure, and stand firm. But he shrank from the responsibility, saying,] "I have never done anybody any harm, and I never will; I will not have a drop of blood spilt for the preservation of my greatness, which is a burden to me."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 14, p. 220.

5958. WEAKNESS by Enlargement. Empire of the Mohammedans. The third and most obvious cause of the decline and fall of the caliphs was the weight and magnitude of the empire itself. The caliph Almamon might proudly assert that it was easier for him to rule the East and the West than to manage a chess-board of two feet square; yet I suspect that in both those games he was guilty of many fatal mistakes.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 52, p. 325.

5959. WEAKNESS of great Men. Demosthenes. [At the battle of Cheronæa] Demosthenes, who was a greater statesman than a warrior, and more capable of giving wholesome counsel in his harangues than of supporting them by an intrepid courage, threw down his arms, and fled with the rest. It is even said that in his flight his robe being caught by a bramble, he imagined that some of the enemy had laid hold of him, and cried out, "Spare my life!" More than 1000 Athenians were left upon the field of battle, and above 2000 taken prisoners, among whom was Demades, the orator. The loss was as great on the Theban side.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 14, § 6.

5960. WEAKNESS, Moral. Milo the Athlete. [He was the champion wrestler of Greece.] An author has judiciously observed that this surprisingly robust champion, who prided himself so much on his bodily strength, was the weakest of men with regard to a passion which often subdues and captivates the strongest; a courtesan having gained so great an ascendancy over Milo that she tyrannized over him in the most imperious manner, and made him obey whatever commands she laid upon him.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 7, ch. 3, § 299.

5961. WEALTH, Conservation of. Reign of James II. [He desired to secure the religious revolution of England by securing a Roman Catholic succession to the throne.] To all men not utterly blinded by passion, these difficulties appeared insuperable. The most unscrupulous slaves of power showed signs of uneasiness. Dryden muttered that the king would only make matters worse by trying to mend them, and sighed for the golden days of the careless and good-natured Charles. Even Jeffreys wavered. As long as he was poor, he was perfectly ready to face obloquy and public hatred for lucre. But he had now, by corruption and extortion, accumulated great riches; and he was more anxious to secure them than to increase them. His slackness drew on him a sharp reprimand from the royal lips. In dread of being deprived of the great seal, he promised whatever was required of him; but Barillon, in reporting this circumstance to Louis, remarked that the King of England could place little reliance on any man who had anything to lose.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 291.

5962. WEALTH, Corrupting. Religion. The story of Paul of Samosata, who filled the metropolitan see of Antioch, while the East was in the hands of de Onathus and Zenobia, may serve to illustrate the condition and character of the times. The wealth of that prelate was a sufficient evidence of his guilt, since it was neither derived from the inheritance of his fathers nor acquired by the arts of honest industry. But Paul considered the service of the Church as a very lucrative profession. His ecclesiastical jurisdiction was venal and rapacious; he extorted frequent contributions from the most opulent of the faithful, and converted to his own use a considerable part of the public revenue. By his pride and luxury the Christian religion was rendered odious in the eyes of the Gentiles. His council chamber and his throne, the splendor with which he appeared in public, the suppliant crowd who solicited his attention, the multitude of letters and petitions to which he dictated his answers, and the perpetual hurry of business in which he was involved, were circumstances much better suited to the state of a civil magistrate than to the humility of a primitive bishop.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 53.

5963. WEALTH by Corruption. Lord Clarendon. [Lord Clarendon, chancellor for the corrupt Charles II.,] returned from exile in the deepest poverty. In seven years he had acquired a sufficient fortune to build a mansion superior to ducal palaces, and to furnish it with the most costly objects of taste and luxury. It was called "Dunkirk House" by the people, because they saw what they believed to be evidence of foreign bribery.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 17, p. 301.

5964. WEALTH, Cost of. Samuel Johnson. Mrs. Thrale mentioned a gentleman who had acquired a fortune of £4000 a year in trade, but was absolutely miserable, because he could not talk in company; so miserable, that he was impelled to lament his situation in the street to —, whom he hates, and who he knows despises him. "I am a most unhappy man," said he. "I am invited to conversations. I go to conversations;

but, alas! I have no conversation." JOHNSON: "Man commonly cannot be successful in different ways. This gentleman has spent, in getting £4000 a year, the time in which he might have learned to talk; and now he cannot talk." Mr. Perkins made a shrewd and droll remark: "If he had got his £4000 a year as a mountebank, he might have learned to talk at the same time that he was getting his fortune."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 455.

5965. — — —. Samuel Johnson. The conversation having turned on the prevailing practice of going to the East Indies in quest of wealth. JOHNSON: "A man had better have £10,000 at the end of ten years passed in England than £20,000 at the end of ten years passed in India, because you must compute what you give for money; and a man who has lived ten years in India has given up ten years of social comfort, and all those advantages which arise from living in England."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 415.

5966. WEALTH, Dangerous. To Piety. John Wesley remarked in early life that he had known but four men who had not declined in religion by becoming wealthy; at a later period in life he corrected the remark, and made no exception.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 268.

5967. WEALTH, Despoiled of. By Cromwell. The old Irish gentry were scattered over the whole world. Descendants of Milesian chieftains swarmed in all the courts and camps of the Continent. The despoiled proprietors who still remained in their native land brooded gloomily over their losses, pined for the opulence and dignity of which they had been deprived, and cherished wild hopes of another revolution. A person of this class was described by his countryman as a gentleman who would be rich if justice were done, as a gentleman who had a fine estate if he could only get it.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 120.

5968. WEALTH destroyed. For Safety. After the retreat [from Africa] of the Saracens, the victorious prophetess [Cahina] assembled the Moorish chiefs, and recommended a measure of strange and savage policy. "Our cities," said she, "and the gold and silver which they contain, perpetually attract the arms of the Arabs. These vile metals are not the objects of our ambition; we content ourselves with the simple productions of the earth. Let us destroy these cities; let us bury in their ruins those pernicious treasures; and when the avarice of our foes shall be destitute of temptation, perhaps they will cease to disturb the tranquillity of a warlike people." The proposal was accepted with unanimous applause. From Tangier to Tripoli the buildings, or at least the fortifications, were demolished, the fruit-trees were cut down, the means of subsistence were extirpated, a fertile and populous garden was changed into a desert, and the historians of a more recent period could discern the frequent traces of the prosperity and devastation of their ancestors.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 246.

5969. WEALTH, Enormous. Cantaquuzene. [This grand chamberlain and adroit intriguer of the Turkish empire became the possessor of enormous wealth.] The register of his private wealth reminds us of the opulence of Lucullus and of Crassus at Rome. The confiscation of his treasures in silver, after his first exile, sufficed to equip a fleet of sixty vessels. His granaries contained the provisions of a capital, in barley and wheat. Two thousand yoke of oxen tilled his lands in Thrace; two thousand five hundred mares supplied with horses his stables; three hundred camels, five hundred mules, five hundred asses, fifty thousand hogs, seventy thousand sheep, filled his farmyards or covered his pastures.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 224.

5970. WEALTH, Failure of. Samuel Johnson. Johnson and I set out in Dr. Taylor's chaise to go to Derby. The day was fine, and we resolved to go by Keddlestone, the seat of Lord Scarsdale, that I might see his Lordship's fine house. I was struck with the magnificence of the building; and the extensive park, with the finest verdure, covered with deer and cattle and sheep, delighted me. The number of old oaks, of an immense size, filled me with a sort of respectful admiration; for one of them £60 was offered. The excellent smooth gravel roads; the large piece of water, formed by his Lordship from some small brooks, with a handsome barge upon it; the venerable Gothic church, now the family chapel, just by the house—in short, the grand group of objects agitated and distended my mind in a most agreeable manner. "One should think," said I, "that the proprietor of all this must be happy." "Nay, sir," said Johnson; "all this excludes but one evil—poverty."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 339.

5971. WEALTH by Flattery. Rome. A rich childish old man was a domestic tyrant, and his power increased with his years and infirmities. A servile crowd, in which he frequently reckoned patrons and consuls, courted his smiles, pampered his avarice, applauded his follies, served his passions, and waited with impatience for his death. The arts of attendance and flattery were formed into a most lucrative science; those who professed it acquired a peculiar appellation; and the whole city, according to the lively descriptions of satire, was divided between two parties—the hunters and their game. [The flatterers hoped for legacies.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 192.

5972. WEALTH, Genius for. Marcus Crassus. He made himself useful to the Dictator by his genius for finance, and in return he was enabled to amass an enormous fortune for himself out of the proscriptions. His eye for business reached over the whole Roman Empire. He was banker, speculator, contractor, merchant. He lent money to the spendthrift young lords, but with sound security and at usurious interest. He had an army of slaves, but these slaves were not ignorant field-hands; they were skilled workmen in all arts and trades, whose labors he turned to profit in building streets and palaces. Thus all that he touched turned to gold. He was the wealthiest single individual in the whole empire, the acknowledged head of the business world of Rome.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 9, p. 16.

5973. WEALTH, Hopes of. Abraham Lincoln. A.D. 1860. [Mr. Lincoln visited New York, where he met a former resident of Illinois.] "Well, B., how have you fared since you left Illinois?" To which B. replied: "I have made $100,000, and lost it all; how is it with you, Mr. Lincoln?" "Oh, very well," said Mr. Lincoln; "I have the cottage at Springfield, and about $3000 in money. If they make me Vice-President with Seward, as some say they will, I hope I shall be able to increase it to $20,000, and that is as much as any man ought to want."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 3, p. 100.

5974. WEALTH, Immoderate. Romans. The historian Olympiodorus, who represents the state of Rome when it was besieged by the Goths, . . . observes that several of the richest senators received from their estates an annual income of four thousand pounds of gold above one hundred and sixty thousand pounds sterling, without computing the stated provision of corn and wine, which, had they been sold, might have equalled in value one third of the money. Compared to this immoderate wealth, an ordinary revenue of a thousand or fifteen hundred pounds of gold might be considered as no more than adequate to the dignity of the senatorian rank, which required many expenses of a public and ostentatious kind. [About A.D. 400].—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 249.

5975. WEALTH by Labor. Peter Cooper. Now followed thirty years of steady hard work. He learned how to make the best glue that ever was made in the world, and it brought the highest price. For twenty years he had no book-keeper, no clerk, no salesman, no agent. He was up at the dawn of day. He lighted the factory fires, so as to be ready for the men at seven o'clock. He boiled his own glue. At midday he drove into town in his wagon, called upon his customers, and sold them glue and isinglass. At home in the evening, posting his books and reading to his family. Such was his life for thirty years, his business producing him thirty thousand dollars a year, a large portion of which he saved, always thinking and often talking of the institution which he hoped to found. Glue is made from bullocks' feet, and for many years he consumed in his glue factory all the feet which the city yielded, and saw the price gradually rise from one cent to twelve cents per foot.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 574.

5976. WEALTH, Perils of. Roman Emperor Diocletian. One very remarkable edict which he published, instead of being condemned as the effect of jealous tyranny, deserves to be applauded as an act of prudence and humanity. He caused a diligent inquiry to be made "for all the ancient books which treated of the admirable art of making gold and silver, and without pity committed them to the flames, apprehensive, as we are assured, lest the opulence of the Egyptians should inspire them with confidence to rebel against the empire." . . . It may be remarked that these ancients book, so liberally ascribed to Pythagoras, to Solomon, or to Hermes, were the pious frauds of more recent adepts. . . . The persecution of Diocletian is the first authentic event in the history of alchemy. The conquest of Egypt by the Arabs diffused that vain science over the globe. Ungenial to the avarice of the human heart, it was studied in China, as in Europe, with equal eagerness and with equal success. The darkness of the Middle Ages insured a favorable reception to every tale of wonder, and the revival of learning gave new vigor to hope, and suggested more specious arts of deception. Philosophy, with the aid of experience, has at length banished the study of alchemy.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 13, p. 418.

5977. WEALTH, Relative. New Yorkers. A.D. 1678. The poor were relieved, and beggars unknown. A thousand pounds was opulence; the possessor of half that sum was rich.—BANCROFT'S U. S., ch. 17.

5978. WEALTH repudiated. John Wesley. In his "Appeal to Men of Reason," he said: "Hear ye this, all who have discovered the treasures which I am to leave behind me; if I leave behind me £10 (above my debts and my books, or what may happen to be due on account of them), you and all mankind bear witness against me that I lived and died a thief and a robber." The state of his affairs at his death, nearly half a century after, fully verified this pledge.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 268.

5979. WEALTH, Reputation for. Roman Emperor Justinian. The riches of Justinian were speedily exhausted by alms and buildings, by ambitious wars and ignominious treatises. His revenues were found inadequate to his expenses. Every art was tried to extort from the people the gold and silver which he scattered with a lavish hand from Persia to France; his reign was marked by the vicissitudes, or rather by the combat, of rapaciousness and avarice, of splendor and poverty; he lived with the reputation of hidden treasures, and bequeathed to his successor the payment of his debts.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 60, p. 75.

5980. WEALTH, Rural. John Cantacuzene. [The Greek politician.] Under the reign of Andronicus the Younger the great domestic ruled the emperor and the empire. . . . He does not measure the size and number of his estates; but his granaries were heaped with an incredible store of wheat and barley; and the labor of a thousand yokes of oxen might cultivate, according to the practice of antiquity, about sixty-two thousand five hundred acres of arable land. His pastures were stocked with 2500 brood mares, 200 camels, 300 mules, 500 asses, 5000 horned cattle, 50,000 hogs, and 70,000 sheep—a precious record of rural opulence.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 63, p. 183.

5981. WEALTH, Scheme of. Pope Boniface VIII. [In 1300] proclaimed a plenary absolution to all Catholics who, in the course of that year, and at every similar period, should respectfully visit the apostolic churches of St. Peter and St. Paul. The welcome sound was propagated through Christendom; and at first from the nearest provinces of Italy, and at length from the remote kingdoms of Hungary and Britain, the highways were thronged with a swarm of pilgrims who sought to expiate their sins in a journey, however costly or laborious, which was exempt from the perils of military service. All exceptions of rank or sex, of age or infirmity, were forgotten in the common transport; and in the streets and churches many persons were trampled to death by the eagerness of devotion. The calculation of their numbers could not be easy or accurate; and they have probably been magnified by a dexterous clergy, well apprised of the contagion of example; yet we are assured by a judicious historian who assisted at the ceremony that Rome was never replenished with less than two hundred thousand strangers; and another spectator has fixed at two millions the total concourse of the year. A trifling oblation from each individual would accumulate a royal treasure; and two priests stood night and day, with rakes in their hands, to collect, without counting, the heaps of gold and silver that were poured on the altar of St. Paul.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 69, p. 457.

5982. WEALTH well secured. Stilpon. The city of Megara being taken, the soldiers demanded leave to plunder the inhabitants; but the Athenians interceded for them so effectually that the city was saved. Demetrius drove out the garrison of Cassander, and reinstated Megara in its liberties. Stilpon, a celebrated philosopher, lived in that city, and was sent for by Demetrius, who asked him if he had not lost something. "Nothing at all," replied Stilpon, "for I carry all my effects about me;" meaning by that expression his justice, probity, temperance, and wisdom; with the advantage of not ranking anything in the class of blessings that could be taken from him. What could all the kings of the earth do in conjunction against such a man as this, who neither desires nor dreads anything.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 16, § 7.

5983. WEALTH, Slavery to. Spaniards. Spain, by a very singular fatality, was the Peru and Mexico of the old world. The discovery of the rich western continent by the Phœnicians, and the oppression of the simple natives, who were compelled to labor in their own mines for the benefit of strangers, form an exact type of the more recent history of Spanish America.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 6, p. 183.

5984. WEALTH, Wise Use of. Peter Cooper. We cite the authority of the Electrical Review, which, in paying its tribute to Mr. Cooper, says: "It is not for us to dwell upon the spirit of philanthropy and catholicity of the man, to whom it gives the first honors among the Fathers of the Atlantic cable. That great work was planned and accomplished by Peter Cooper. To him, more than to any of his associates, is due the successful laying of the Atlantic cable.—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 24.

5985. WEALTH, Visionary. De Soto in Florida. In Cuba, . . . two Indians brought as captives to Havana invented such falsehoods as they perceived would be acceptable. They conversed by signs, and their signs were interpreted as affirming that Florida abounded in gold. The news spread great contentment; De Soto and his troops were restless with longing for the hour to arrive of their departure to the conquest of "the richest country which had yet been discovered."—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 2.

5986. WEAPONS, Needless. The Rebellion. When . . . the Confederate troops first turned out, they were in the habit of wearing numerous revolvers and bowie-knives. General Lee is said to have mildly remarked: "Gentlemen, I think you will find an Enfield rifle, a bayonet, and sixty rounds of ammunition as much as you can conveniently carry in the way of arms." They laughed, and thought they knew better; but the six-shooters and bowie-knives gradually disappeared. — POLLARD'S SECOND YEAR OF THE WAR, p. 329.

5988. WEDDING, Present for a. Slaves. Among the Goths, Burgundians, and Franks absolute power of life and death was exercised by the lords; and when they married their daughters a train of useful servants, chained on the wagons to prevent their escape, was sent as a nuptial present into a distant country. — GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 38, p. 603.

5989. WEDLOCK, Golden. Spartans. Lysander's poverty having been discovered after his death did great honor to his memory; when it was known that of all the gold and riches which had passed through his hands, of a power so extensive as his had been, of so many cities under his government, and which made their court to him—in a word, of that kind of dominion and sovereignty always exercised by him, he had made no manner of advantage for the advancement and enriching of his house. Some days before his death two of the principal citizens of Sparta had contracted themselves to his two daughters; but when they knew in what condition he had left his affairs, they refused to marry them. The republic did not suffer so sordid a baseness to go unpunished, nor permit Lysander's poverty, which was the strongest proof of his justice and virtue, to be treated as an obstacle to an alliance into his family. They were fined in a great sum, publicly disgraced, and exposed to the contempt of all persons of honor. For at Sparta there were penalties established, not only for such as refused to marry, or married too late, but also for those who married amiss; and those especially were reckoned of this number who, instead of forming alliances with virtuous families and with their own relations, had no motive but wealth and lucre in marriage. — ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 3, § 4.

5990. WELCOME, A grateful. Wife of James II. [The king and queen of England were fugitives and self-exiled.] Mary was on the road toward the French court when news came that her husband had, after a rough voyage, landed safe at the little village of Ambletuse. Persons of high rank were instantly despatched from Versailles to greet and escort him. Meanwhile Louis, attended by his family and his nobility, went forth in state to receive the exiled queen. Before his gorgeous coach went the Swiss halberdiers. On each side of it and behind it rode the bodyguards, with cymbals clashing and trumpets pealing. After him, in a hundred carriages, each drawn by six horses, came the most splendid aristocracy of Europe, all feathers, ribbons, jewels, and embroidery. Before the procession had gone far it was announced that Mary was approaching. Louis alighted and advanced on foot to meet her. She broke forth into passionate expressions of gratitude. "Madam," said her host, "it is but a melancholy service that I am rendering you to-day. I hope that I may be able hereafter to render you services greater and more pleasing." He embraced the little Prince of Wales, and made the queen seat herself in the royal state-coach on the right hand. The cavalcade then turned toward Saint Germain's. — MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 554.

5991. WELCOME, Public. To Cromwell. [After the subjugation of Ireland he returned to London.] On Hounslow Heath he was met by General Fairfax, many members of Parliament, and officers of the army, and multitudes of the common people. Coming to Hyde Park, he was received by the Lord Mayor and Corporation of the city of London; the great guns were fired off, and Colonel Barkstead's regiment, which was drawn up for that purpose, gave him several volleys with their small arms. Thus in a triumphant manner he entered London, amid a crowd of attendants, and was received with the highest acclamations. And after resuming his place in Parliament, the Speaker, in an eloquent speech, returned him the thanks of the House for his great and faithful services in Ireland; after which the lord-lieutenant gave them a particular account of the state and condition of that kingdom. It was while he rode thus in state through London that Oliver replied to some sycophantic person who had observed, "What a crowd comes out to see your Lordship's triumph!" "Yes; but if it were to see me hanged, how many more would there be!" Here is a clear-headed, practical man. — HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 11, p. 145.

5992. WIDOWHOOD, Consolation of. Isaac Newton. [He was an unsuccessful lover in early life.] He appeared to have thought no more of love or marriage till he was sixty. Rich and famous then, he aspired to the hand of Lady Norris, the widow of a baronet, and he wrote her a quaint and curious love-letter. He began by remonstrating with her upon her excessive grief for the loss of her husband, telling her that "to be always thinking on the dead is to live a melancholy life among sepulchres." He asks her if she can resolve to spend the rest of her days in grief and sickness, and wear forever a widow's weeds, a costume "less acceptable to company," and keeping her always in mind of her loss. "The proper remedy for all these griefs and mischiefs," he adds, "is a new husband," whose estate, added to her own, would enable her to live more at ease. He says in conclusion: "I doubt not but in a little time to have notice of your ladyship's inclinations to marry; at least that you will give me leave to discourse with you about it." The lady's answer has not been preserved; but as the marriage never took place, we may presume that the great Sir Isaac Newton had to figure in the character of a rejected lover.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 254.

5993. WIFE abandoned. Poet Shelley. That Shelley, early in 1814, had no intention of leaving his wife is probable; for he was re-married to her on the 24th of March. . . . Harriet was pregnant, and this ratification of the Scotch marriage was no doubt intended to place the legitimacy of a possible heir beyond all question. Yet . . . in the very month after this new ceremony Shelley found the difficulties of his wedded life insuperable. . . . About the middle of June the separation actually occurred—not by mutual consent, . . . but by Shelley's sudden abandonment of his wife and child. For a short while Harriet was left in ignorance of his abode, and with a very insufficient sum of money at her disposal.—SYMONDS' SHELLEY, ch. 4.

5994. WIFE, Authority of. Lady Fairfax. On the 29th of June, within a single month of his arrival at home [from subduing the Irish rebels], he set forth on his great military expedition to Scotland. The Parliament had wished Lord Fairfax to take command and set things right there; but although Fairfax was an Independent, his wife was a Presbyterian, and she would not allow her husband to go. We believe that it was very well that it was so.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 11, p. 145.

5995. WIFE by bequest. Athens. It was a very singular law of the Athenians, which permitted a man to bequeath his wife, like any other part of his estate, to any one whom he chose for his successor. The mother of Demosthenes was left by will to Aphobus, with a fortune of eighty minæ. The form of such a bequest has been preserved, and runs thus: "This is the last will of Pasio the Acharnean. I bequeath my wife, Archippe, to Phormio, with a fortune of one talent in Peparrhetus, one talent in Attica, a house worth a hundred minæ, together with the female slaves, the ornaments of gold, and whatever else may be in it."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 10, p. 104.

5996. WIFE, Counsels of a. Theodora. The prudence of [his wife] Theodora is celebrated by [the Roman emperor] Justinian himself; and his laws are attributed to the sage counsels of his most reverend wife, whom he had received as the gift of the Deity. Her courage was displayed amid the tumult of the people and the terrors of the court. Her chastity, from the moment of her union with Justinian, is founded on the silence of her implacable enemies; and although the daughter of Acacius might be satiated with love, yet some applause is due to the firmness of a mind which could sacrifice pleasure and habit to the stronger sense either of duty or interest.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 55.

5997. WIFE, An energetic. Margaret of Anjou. Henry [VI.] was dragged to the battle of St. Alban's, where the party of York gained a complete victory. The king was wounded and taken prisoner, but treated by the victor with great respect and tenderness. He was soon after led in triumph to London; and the Duke of York, permitting him still to enjoy the title of king, assumed to himself that of protector, under which he exercised all the real powers of the sovereign. Margaret of Anjou, whose courage rose from her misfortunes, prepared to avenge the cause of her husband, and to support the regal authority. With the assistance of those nobles who were devoted to the house of Lancaster, she raised a considerable army, and met the troops of York on the borders of Staffordshire. A desertion from that party increased so much the strength of the royal army, that their opponents instantly dispersed, and the duke fled into Ireland, while his cause was secretly maintained in England by Guy, Earl of Warwick, a man of great abilities and of the most undaunted fortitude. By degrees the activity of this nobleman collected an army sufficient to take the field. Margaret of Anjou had ranged her army at Northampton, determined to fight herself at the head of her troops, while the despicable king remained in his tent, awaiting in great perturbation the issue of the engagement. The royal army was overthrown, and Henry once more made a prisoner, and brought back to London. Margaret fled with precipitation to Wales, and, her manly spirit never deserting her, employed herself in levying a new army for the rescue of her husband and the re-establishment of his authority.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 14, p. 224.

5998. WIFE, A generous. Of William, Prince of Orange. All the peculiarities of his character fitted him [Bishop Burnet] to be the peace-maker between William and Mary. Where persons who ought to esteem and love each other are kept asunder, as often happens, by some cause which three words of frank explanation would remove, they are fortunate if they possess an indiscreet friend who blurts out the whole truth. Burnet plainly told the princess what the feeling was which preyed upon her husband's mind. She learned for the first time, with no small astonishment, that when she became Queen of England William would not share her throne. She warmly declared that there was no proof of conjugal submission and affection which she was not ready to give. Burnet, with many apologies, and with solemn protestations that no human being had put words into his mouth, informed her that the remedy was in her own hands. She might easily, when the crown devolved on her, induce her Parliament not only to give the regal title to her husband, but even to transfer to him by a legislative act the administration of the government. "But," he added, "your Royal Highness ought to consider well before you announce any such resolution; for it is a resolution which, having once been announced, cannot safely or easily be retracted." "I want no time for consideration," answered Mary. "It is enough that I have an opportunity of showing my regard for the prince. Tell him what I say, and bring him to me, that he may hear it from my own lips." Burnet went in quest of William, but William was many miles off after a stag. It was not till the next day that the decisive interview took place. "I did not know till yesterday," said Mary, "that there was such a difference between the laws of England and the laws of God. But I now promise you that you shall always bear rule ; and, in return, I ask only this, that, as I shall observe the precept which enjoins wives to obey their husbands, you will observe that which enjoins husbands to love their wives." Her generous affection completely gained the heart of William. From that time till the sad day when he was carried away in fits from her dying-bed there was entire friendship and confidence between them.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 166.

5999. WIFE honored. Mrs. Jackson. A few weeks after the battle of New Orleans, when her husband was in the first flush of his triumph, this plain planter's wife floated down the Mississippi to New Orleans to visit her husband and to accompany him home. She had never seen a city before, for Nashville at that day was little more than a village. The elegant ladies of New Orleans were exceedingly pleased to observe that General Jackson, though he was himself one of the most graceful and polite of gentlemen, seemed totally unconscious of the homely bearing, the country manners, and awkward dress of his wife. In all companies and on all occasions he showed her every possible mark of respect. The ladies gathered about her and presented her with all sorts of showy knick-knacks and jewelry, and one of them undertook the task of selecting suitable clothes for her. She frankly confessed that she knew nothing about such things, and was willing to wear anything that the ladies thought proper. Much as she enjoyed her visit, I am sure she was glad enough to return to her old home on the banks of the Cumberland and resume her oversight of the dairy and the plantation.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 587.

6000. WIFE, A rebellious. John Milton's. The girl herself conceived an equal repugnance to the husband she had thoughtlessly accepted, probably on the strength of his good looks, which was all of Milton that she was capable of appreciating. [Milton permitted her to visit her mother one month after marriage.] Mary Milton went to Forest Hill in July, but on the understanding that she was to come back at Michaelmas. When the appointed time came she did not appear. Milton wrote for her to come. No answer. Several other letters met the same fate. At last he despatched a foot-messenger to Forest Hill, desiring her return. The messenger came back only to report that he had been "dismissed with some sort of contempt." It was evident that Mary Milton's family had espoused her cause as against her husband.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 5.

6001. WIFE remembered. Washington. Forty years a husband, . . . from the time of his marriage until he ceased to live . . . he wore suspended from his neck by a gold chain the miniature portrait of his wife.—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 2.

6002. ——. Mrs. Samuel Johnson. [He was a man of impetuous temper.] After her death [he was] tenderly disposed to charge himself with slight omissions and offences, the sense of which would give him much uneasiness. Accordingly we find, about a year after her decease, that he thus addressed the Supreme Being : "O Lord, who givest the grace of repentance, and hearest the prayer of the penitent, grant that by true contrition I may obtain forgiveness of all the sins committed, and of all duties neglected, in my union with the wife whom thou hast taken from me ; for the neglect of joint devotion, patient exhortation, and mild instruction."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 62.

6003. WIFE, A true. Mary. [The two houses of Parliament were assembled in convention to determine the best method of filling the vacant throne of James II. Mary, wife of the Prince of Orange, was his daughter. Her private chaplain, Bishop] Burnet, thought that the importance of the crisis justified him in publishing the great secret which the princess had confided to him. He knew, he said, from her own lips that it had long been her full determination, even if she came to the throne in the regular course of descent, to surrender her power, with the sanction of Parliament, into the hands of her husband. Danby received from her an earnest and almost angry reprimand. She was, she wrote, the prince's wife ; she had no other wish than to be subject to him ; the most cruel injury that could be done to her would be to set her up as his competitor ; and she never could regard any person who took such a course as her true friend.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 10, p. 595.

6004. WIFE, An unhappy. Jane Seymour. The Parliament, with the meanest submission to the will of the tyrant [Henry VIII.], passed sentence of death, and Anne Bullen was removed from the throne to the scaffold. She left by Henry a daughter, Elizabeth, afterward queen of England. Henry was next day publicly married to Jane Seymour, who, happily for herself, died about a year afterward.—TYTTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 302.

6005. WIFE and Vixen. Mrs. John Fitch. He incurred the greatest calamity known to human nature. He married a vixen. The woman, who was much older than himself, made his life one horrid broil. He was one of the mildest, kindest, most patient of men ; but after enduring some months of this degrading anguish, after frequently warning his wife that if she did not restrain her temper he would leave her, he at last abandoned his home, his property, his wife, his infant son, and his unborn daughter. It was a terrible hour to him. His wife, who had always laughed at his threats, followed him a mile, crying and humbly begging him to try her once more. "But," he says, "my judgment informed me that it was my duty to go, notwithstanding the struggles of nature I had to contend with."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 149.

6006. WIFE, A Warrior's. Gaita. Gaita, the wife of Robert [Guiscard], is painted by the Greeks as a warlike Amazon, a second Pallas ; less skilful in arts, but not less terrible in arms, than the Athenian goddess ; though wounded by an arrow, she stood her ground, and strove, by her exhortation and example, to rally the flying troops. Her female voice was seconded by the more powerful voice and arm of [her husband] the Norman duke, as calm in action as he was magnanimous in counsel. "Whither," he cried aloud—"whither do ye fly ? Your enemy is implacable ; and death is less grievous than servitude." The moment was decisive ; as the Varangians advanced before the line they discovered the nakedness of their flanks ; the main battle of the duke, of 800 knights, stood firm and entire ; they couched their lances, and the Greeks deplore the furious and irresistible shock of the French cavalry. [They won the battle of Durazzo.]—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 56, p. 473.

6007. WIFE, A winning. Of William, Prince of Orange. For a time William was a negligent husband. He was, indeed, drawn away from his wife by other women, particularly by one of her ladies, Elizabeth Villiers, who, though destitute of personal attractions, and disfigured by a hideous squint, possessed talents which well fitted her to partake his cares. He was, indeed, ashamed of his errors, and spared no pains to conceal them ; but in spite of all his precautions, Mary well knew that he was not strictly faithful to her. Spies and tale-bearers, encouraged by her father, did their best to inflame her resentment. . . . She, however, bore her injuries with a meekness and patience which deserved, and gradually obtained, William's esteem and gratitude. [See No. 5998.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 160.

6008. WIFE, Worthy. Calphurnia. [Pliny writes to his wife's aunt :] "As I remember the great affection which was between you and your excellent brother, and know you love his daughter as your own, so as not only to express the tenderness of the best of aunts, but even to supply that of the best of fathers, I am sure it will give you pleasure to hear that she proves worthy of her father, worthy of you, and of your and her ancestors. Her ingenuity is admirable ; her frugality is extraordinary. She loves me, the surest pledge of her virtue ; and adds to this a wonderful disposition to learning, which she has acquired from her affection to me. She reads my writings, studies them, and even gets them by heart. You would smile to see the concern she is in when I have a cause to plead, and the joy she shows when it is over. She finds means to have the first news brought her of the success I met with in court, how I am heard, and what decree is made. If I recite anything in public, she cannot refrain from placing herself privately in some corner to hear, where, with the utmost delight, she feasts upon my applauses ; sometimes she sings my verses, and accompanies them with the lute, without any master, except the best of instructors.

6009. WIFE, A wronged. Catherine II. Seventeen years after her marriage with Peter [III.] the Empress Elizabeth died, leaving her husband the heir to the throne. It now appeared that the unfortunate Peter, who was then wholly governed by one of his mistresses, had resolved to repudiate his wife as an adulteress, and to place upon the throne the companion of his debaucheries. Many authors assert that Catherine had been indeed false to her husband ; but upon considering all the facts in the case, I find the probabilities tend strongly toward her exculpation, and the best authorities agree in believing that Peter was the veritable father of Catherine's children. Aware of the intention of her husband, Catherine and her adherents resolved to prevent its execution by setting aside Peter himself. [Next to Frederick the Great, Catherine II. became the most renowned monarch of her time.]—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 404.

6010. WINE, Charm of. Gauls. The Gauls happening to taste of wine, which was then for the first time brought out of Italy, they so much admired the liquor, and were so enchanted with this new pleasure, that they snatched up their arms, and taking their parents along with them, marched to the Alps, to seek that country which produced such excellent fruit, and in comparison of which they considered all others as barren and ungenial.—PLUTARCH'S CAMIL-LUS.

6011. WINE, Danger in. Ancients. The ancients, who so well knew the excellency of wine, were not ignorant of the dangers attending too free an use of it. I need not mention the law of Zaleucus, by which the Epizephyrian Locrians were universally forbid the use of wine upon pain of death, except in case of sickness. The inhabitants of Marseilles and Melitus showed more moderation and indulgence, and contented themselves with prohibiting it to women. At Rome, in the early ages, young persons of liberal condition were not permitted to drink wine till the age of thirty ; but as for the women, the use of it was absolutely forbid to them ; and the reason of that prohibition was, because intemperance of that kind might induce them to commit the most excessive crimes. Seneca complains bitterly that this custom was almost universally violated in his times. The weak and delicate complexion of the women, says he, is not changed ; but their manners are changed, and no longer the same. They value themselves upon carrying excess of wine to as great an height as the most robust men. Like them, they pass whole nights at table, and with a full glass of unmixed wine in their hands, they glory in vying with them, and, if they can, in overcoming them. The Emperor Domitian passed an edict in relation to wine, which seemed to have a just foundation. One year having produced abundance of wine and very little corn, he believed they had more occasion for the one than the other, and therefore decreed that no more vines should be planted in Italy ; and that in the provinces at least one half of the vines should be rooted up. Philostratus expresses himself as if the decree ordained that they should all be pulled up, at least in Asia.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 24, art. 3, § 1.

6012. WINE, Deception in. Samuel Johnson. We talked of drinking wine. JOHNSON : "I require wine only when I am alone. I have then often wished for it, and often taken it." SPOTTSWOODE : "What, by way of a companion, sir ?" JOHNSON : "To get rid of myself, to send myself away. Wine gives great pleasure ; and every pleasure is of itself a good. It is a good, unless counterbalanced by evil. A man may have a strong reason not to drink wine ; and that may be greater than the pleasure. Wine makes a man better pleased with himself. I do not say that it makes him more pleasing to others. Sometimes it does. But the danger is, that while a man grows better pleased with himself, he may be growing less pleasing to others. Wine gives a man nothing. It neither gives him knowledge nor wit ; it only animates a man, and enables him to bring out what a dread of the company has repressed."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 391.

6013. WINE defended. Samuel Johnson. I resolutely ventured to undertake the defence of convivial indulgence in wine, though he was not to-night in the most genial humor. After urging the common plausible topics, I at last had recourse to the maxim, in vino veritas, a man who is well warmed with wine will speak truth. JOHNSON: "Why, sir, that may be an argument for drinking, if you suppose men in general to be liars. But, sir, I would not keep company with a fellow who lies as long as he is sober, and whom you must make drunk before you can get a word of truth out of him."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 196.

6014. WINE forbidden. Women. Romulus made the drinking of wine, as well as adultery, a capital crime in women. For he said adultery opens the door to all sorts of crimes, and wine opens the door to adultery. The severity of this law was softened in succeeding ages; the women who were overtaken in liquor were not condemned to die, but to lose their dowers.—LANGHORNE'S NOTE IN PLUTARCH'S NUMA AND LYCURGUS.

6015. WISDOM, False in. Aristotle. [He taught that the heat of the body cooked the food eaten.] The liquefied food steams up into the heart, where it is converted into blood. Nature, he says, being a good economist, gives the best part of the food to the noblest parts of the body; as masters eat the best portions of an animal, the slaves the inferior parts, and the dogs the refuse. Since the interior of the body is so hot that food is cooked merely by the natural heat, he felt it necessary to explain why the body did not get too hot, and consume itself. This would certainly be the case, he says, if we did not continually inhale cool air! Breathing is the cooling process; and air alone, he adds, would answer the purpose, because its lightness enables it to penetrate into many parts of the body which water could not enter.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 562.

6016. WISDOM with Ignorance. Aristotle. He took things too much for granted. He believed too easily. Although a writer on anatomy, for example, it is almost certain that he never examined the inside of the human body, much less dissected one. Imagine a doctor of the present day giving such an account of the liver as the following: "The liver is compact and smooth, shining and sweet, though somewhat bitter; and the reason is, that the thoughts falling on it from the intellect, as on a mirror, might terrify it by employing a bitterness akin to its nature; and threateningly mingle this bitterness with the whole liver, so as to give it the black color of bile; or, when images of a different kind are reflected sweetening its bitterness and giving place to that part of the soul which lies near the liver, making it rest at night, with the power of divination, in dreams. Although the liver was constructed for divination, it is only during life that its predictions are clear; after death its oracles become obscure, for it becomes blind."—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 560.

6017. WISDOM, Occasional. Samuel Johnson. Of Dr. Goldsmith he said: "No man was more foolish when he had not a pen in his hand, or more wise when he had."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 438.

6018. WISDOM, Practical. Socrates. After having found, by his own experience, how difficult, abstruse, and intricate, and, at the same time, of how little use that kind of learning was to the generality of mankind, he was the first, as Cicero remarks, who conceived the thought of bringing down philosophy from heaven, to place it in cities, and introduce it into private houses; humanizing it, if I may use that expression, and rendering it more familiar, more useful in common life, more within the reach of man's capacity, and applying it solely to what might make them more rational, just, and virtuous. He thought it was a sort of folly to devote the whole vivacity of his mind and employ all his time in inquiries merely curious and involved in impenetrable darkness, and absolutely incapable of contributing to the happiness of mankind, while he neglected to inform himself in the ordinary duties of life, and to learn what is conformable or opposite to piety, justice, and probity; in what fortitude, temperance, and wisdom consist; what is the end of all government, what the rules of it, and what qualities are necessary for commanding and ruling well.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 4, § 1.

6019. WISDOM ridiculed. Egyptian Expedition of Napoleon. The scientific men, or savans, as they were called, had been supplied with asses to transport their persons and philosophical apparatus. As soon as the body of Mamelukes was seen in the distance the order was given, with military precision, "Form square, savans and asses in the centre." . . . The soldiers amused themselves in calling the asses demi-savans. [On the march to Cairo.]—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 1, ch. 11.

6020. WISDOM, Source of. Folly. [It was a saying of Cato] that wise men learn more from fools than fools from the wise; for the wise avoid the error of fools, while fools do not profit by the examples of the wise.—PLUTARCH'S CATO THE CENSOR.

6021. WISES, Kind. "Better Luck." [When the fallen Emperor Napoleon arrived at Elba, the place of his exile.] . . . the boatswain, in behalf of his shipmates, cap in hand, returned thanks, wishing "his honor long life and better luck next time."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLEON B., vol. 2, ch. 23.

6022. WISES, Ruinous. Covetousness. In some Oriental tale I have read the fable of a shepherd who was ruined by the accomplishment of his own wishes: he had prayed for water; the Ganges was turned into his grounds, and his flock and cottage were swept away by the inundation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 58, p. 567.

6023. WITCH, A suspected. At Labrador. In May, 1577, Captain Frobisher and his men, having first gone in solemn procession to church and partaken of the communion, set sail, and soon reached the scene of their first explorations. Icebergs covered the sea, and continually threatened the vessel with destruction, and they were saved only by the light of the endless northern day. Inhabitants were discovered on the shore. One of these, "a man of large corporature and good proportion," they seized and carried off. Another, an ill-favored old woman, they took for a devil or a witch, and actually pulled off the skins that covered her feet, to see if they were not cloven.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 308.

6024. WITCHCRAFT, Alleged. Salem. The darkest page in the history of New England is that which bears the record of the Salem witchcraft. The same town which, fifty-seven years previously, cast out Roger Williams, was now to become the scene of the most fatal delusion of modern times. In February of 1692, in the same part of Salem, afterward called Danvers, a daughter and a niece of Samuel Parris, the minister, were attacked with a nervous disorder, which rendered them partially insane. Parris believed, or affected to believe, that the two girls were bewitched, and that Tituba, an Indian maid-servant of the household, was the author of the affection. He had seen her performing some of the rude ceremonies of her own religion, and this gave color to his suspicions. He tied Tituba, and whipped the ignorant creature, until, at his own dictation, she confessed herself a witch. Here, no doubt, the matter would have ended had not other causes existed for the continuance and spread of the miserable delusion.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 16, p. 150.

6025. WITCHCRAFT, Epidemic. Salem. In the hope of saving their lives, some of the terrified prisoners now began to confess themselves witches or bewitched. It was soon found that a confession was almost certain to procure liberation. It became evident that the accused were to be put to death, not for being witches or wizards, but for denying the reality of witchcraft. The special court was already in session; convictions followed fast; the gallows stood waiting for its victims. The truth of Mather's preaching was to be established by hanging whoever denied it; and Parris was to save his pastorate by murdering his rival. When the noble Burroughs mounted the scaffold he stood composedly, and repeated correctly the test-prayer, which it was said no wizard could utter. The people broke into sobs and moans, and would have rescued their friend from death, but the tyrant Mather dashed among them on horseback, muttering imprecations, and drove the hangman to his horrid work. Old Giles Cory, seeing that conviction was certain, refused to plead, and was pressed to death. Five women were hanged in one day. Between the 10th of June and 22d of September twenty victims were hurried to their doom. Fifty-five others had been tortured into the confession of abominable falsehoods. A hundred and fifty lay in prison awaiting their fate. Two hundred were accused or suspected, and ruin seemed to impend over New England. But a reaction at last set in among the people.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 16, p. 152.

6026. WITCHCRAFT, Malice in. Salem. Parris had had a quarrel in his church. A part of the congregation desired that George Burroughs, a former minister, should be reinstated, to the exclusion of Parris. Burroughs still lived at Salem, and there was great animosity between the partisans of the former and the present pastor. Burroughs disbelieved in witchcraft, and openly expressed his contempt for the system. Here, then, Parris found an opportunity to turn the confession of the foolish Indian servant against his enemies, to overwhelm his rival with the superstitions of the community, and perhaps to have him put to death. There is no doubt whatever that the whole murderous scheme originated in the personal malice of Parris. There were others ready to aid him, especially the celebrated Cotton Mather, minister of Boston. . . . To these men . . . must be charged the full infamy of what followed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 16, p. 151.

6027. WITCHCRAFT punished. England. 1716. Mrs. Hicks and her daughter, aged nine years, were hanged at Huntingdon "for selling their souls to the devil; tormenting and destroying their neighbors, by making them vomit pins; raising a storm, so that a ship was almost lost, by pulling off her stockings, and making a lather soap."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 27, p. 430.

6028. ———. Salem. By the laws of England witchcraft was punishable with death. The code of Massachusetts was the same as that of the mother-country. . . . On the 21st of March [1692] the horrible proceedings began. Mary Cory was arrested, not indeed for being a witch, but for denying the reality of witchcraft. When brought before the church and court, she denied all guilt, but was convicted and hurried to prison. Sarah Cloyce and Rebecca Nurse, two sisters, of the most exemplary lives, were next apprehended as witches. The only witnesses against them were Tituba, her half-witted Indian husband, and the simple girl Abigail Williams, the niece of Parris. The victims were sent to prison protesting their innocence. Giles Cory, a patriarch of eighty years, was next seized; he also was one of those who had opposed Parris. The Indian accuser fell down before Edward Bishop, pretending to be in a fit under Satanic influence; the sturdy farmer cured him instantly with a sound flogging, and said that he could restore the rest of the afflicted in the same manner. He and his wife were immediately arrested and condemned. George Burroughs, the rival of Parris, was accused and hurried to prison. And so the work went on until seventy-five innocent people were locked up in dungeons. Not a solitary partisan of Parris or Mather had been arrested.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 16, p. 151.

6029. WIT, Dangerous. Claudian the Poet. Claudian was exposed to the enmity of a powerful and unforgiving courtier, whom he had provoked by the insolence of wit. He had compared, in a lively epigram, the opposite characters of two Pretorian prefects of Italy; he contrasts the innocent repose of a philosopher, who sometimes resigned the hours of business to slumber, perhaps to study, with the interesting diligence of a rapacious minister, indefatigable in the pursuit of unjust or sacrilegious gain. "How happy," continues Claudian—"how happy might it be for the people of Italy, if Mallius could be constantly awake, and if Hadrian would always sleep!" . . . Consulting the dictates of prudence rather than of honor, he addressed, in the form of an epistle, a suppliant and humble recantation to the offended prefect.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 237.

6030. WIT, Quick. Woman's. The king [Chas I.] was hard pressed by soldiers in pursuit of him, and they sought for him all over the house, and in the kitchen, too ; but here the girl in the kitchen knew him, for indeed he was there ; and as they entered he looked with trepidation round him, perhaps giving up all for lost now ; but the cook hit him a smart rap with the basting ladle, exclaiming, " Now, then, go on with thy work ; what art thou looking about for ? " And the manœuvre was effectual, and the soldiers started on another track.—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 13, p. 172.

6031. WITNESSES, Abuse of. Chief Justice Jeffreys. One witness named Dunne, partly from concern for Lady Alice, and partly from fright at the threats and maledictions of the chief-justice, entirely lost his head, and at last stood silent. " Oh, how hard the truth is," said Jeffreys, " to come out of a lying Presbyterian knave ! " The witness, after a pause of some minutes, stammered a few unmeaning words. " Was there ever," exclaimed the judge, with an oath—" was there ever such a villain on the face of the earth ? Dost thou believe that there is a God ? Dost thou believe in hell fire ? Of all the witnesses that I ever met with, I never saw thy fellow." Still the poor man, scared out of his senses, remained mute, and again Jeffreys burst forth : " I hope, gentlemen of the jury, that you take notice of the horrible carriage of this fellow. How can one help abhorring both these men and their religion ? A Turk is a saint to such a fellow as this. A pagan would be ashamed of such villainy. Oh, blessed Jesus ! What a generation of vipers do we live among ! " " I cannot tell what to say, my lord," faltered Dunne. The judge again broke forth into a volley of oaths. " Was there ever," he cried, " such an impudent rascal ? Hold the candle to him, that we may see his brazen face. You, gentlemen, that are of counsel for the Crown, see that an information for perjury be preferred against this fellow."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 594.

6032. WITNESS, A false. "Dick" Talbot. A plea was wanted which might justify the [James II.] Duke of York in breaking that promise of marriage by which he had obtained from Anne Hyde the last proof of female affection. Such a plea Talbot, in concert with some of his dissolute companions, undertook to furnish. He affirmed that he had triumphed over the young lady's virtue, made up a long romance about the interviews with which she had indulged him, and related how, in one of his secret visits to her, he had unluckily overturned the chancellor's inkstand upon a pile of papers, and how cleverly she had averted a discovery by laying the blame of the accident on her monkey. These stories, which, if they had been true, would never have passed the lips of any but the basest of mankind, were pure inventions. Talbot was soon forced to own that they were so, and he owned it without a blush.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 45.

6033. WITNESSES, False. Reign of Charles II. [After Titus Oates, the honored impostor, came many imitators.] A wretch named Carstairs, who had earned a living in Scotland by going disguised to conventicles and then informing against the preachers, led the way. Bedloe, a noted swindler, followed ; and soon, from all the brothels, gambling-houses, and sponging-houses of London, false witnesses poured forth to swear away the lives of Roman Catholics. One came with a story about an army of 30,000 men who were to muster in the disguise of pilgrims at Corunna, and to sail thence to Wales. Another had been promised canonization and £500 to murder the king. A third had stepped into an eating-house in Covent Garden, and had there heard a great Roman Catholic banker vow, in the hearing of all the guests and drawers, to kill the heretical tyrant. Oates, that he might not be eclipsed by his imitators, soon added a large supplement to his original narrative. He had the portentous impudence to affirm, among other things, that he had once stood behind a door which was ajar, and had there overheard the queen declare that she had resolved to give her consent to the assassination of her husband. The vulgar believed, and the highest magistrates pretended to believe, even such fictions as these.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 2, p. 222.

6034. WITNESS of the Spirit. Susannah Wesley. John Wesley's mother had rarely heard of the present conscious forgiveness of sins, or the witness of the spirit, much less that it was the common privilege of true believers. " Therefore," she said, " I never durst ask it for myself. But two or three weeks ago, while my son Hall, in delivering the cup to me, was pronouncing these words, ' The blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was given for thee,' they struck through my heart, and I knew that God, for Christ's sake, had forgiven me all my sins." Wesley asked her whether her father (Dr. Annesley) had not the same faith, and if she had not heard him preach it to others. She answered he had it himself, and declared, a little before his death, that for more than forty years he had no darkness, no fear, no doubt at all of his being " accepted in the Beloved."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 135.

6035. WITNESSING for Christ. Primitive Christians. [Among the early Christians it] became the most sacred duty of a new convert to diffuse among his friends and relations the inestimable blessing which he had received, and to warn them against a refusal that would be severely punished as a criminal disobedience to the will of a benevolent but all-powerful Deity.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 65, p. 514.

6036. WIVES, Market for. Jamestown Colony. Sixty were actually despatched, maids of virtuous education, young, handsome, and well recommended. The price rose from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco, and even more ; . . . the debt for a wife took precedence of any other.—BANCROFT'S HIST. OF U. S., vol. 1, ch. 4.

6037. WIVES, Survival of. Widower. Jerom saw at Rome a triumphant husband bury his twenty-first wife, who had interred twenty-two of his less sturdy predecessors.—NOTE IN GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 349.

6038. WOMAN, Adventurous. Engagement. When Philip Henry was settled at Worthenbury he sought the hand of the only daughter and heiress of Mr. Matthews, of Broad Oak. The father demurred, saying that though Mr. Henry was an excellent preacher and a gentleman, yet he did not know from whence he came. " True," said the daughter ; " but I know where he is going, and I should like to go with him."

6039. WOMAN, Adventurous. Pope Joan. Between the pontificate of Leo IV., who died in the year 855, and that of Benedict III., who was elected in 858, a certain woman, who had the address to disguise her sex for a considerable time, is said, by learning, genius, and great address, to have made her way to the papal chair, and to have governed the church for two years, till her holiness was unfortunately detected by bearing a child in the midst of a religious procession. This real or fabulous personage is known by the title of Pope Joan. During five centuries this event was generally believed, and a vast number of writers bore testimony to its truth; nor until the period of the reformation of Luther was it considered by any as either incredible in itself or ignominious to the Church. But in the seventeenth century the existence of this female pontiff became the subject of a keen and learned controversy between the Protestants and the Catholics, the former supporting the truth of the fact, and the latter endeavoring to invalidate the evidence on which it rests. Mosheim, a very learned and acute writer, steers a middle course; and though he is disposed to doubt the many absurd and ridiculous circumstances with which the story has been embellished, for the purpose of throwing ridicule on the head of the Romish church, yet is inclined to think that it is not wholly without foundation. Gibbon treats the story as a mere fable.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 4, p. 94.

6040. WOMAN, Ambitious. Princess Sophia. The czar Alexis Michaelowitz, who first introduced a regular system of laws among the Russians, paved the way for that civilization which his son Peter afterward accomplished. Alexis left three sons, Phædor, Ivan, and Peter [the Great], and a daughter Sophia. Phædor succeeded his father, but died young in the year 1682, leaving the crown to his youngest brother, Peter, then only two years of age, in exclusion of the elder Ivan, a man of no capacity; but the Princess Sophia had that capacity which her brother wanted. She committed some dreadful excesses to obtain the government of the empire, and carried the point so as to cause herself to be associated with her brothers in the regency; but this did not satisfy her. She aimed at an exclusive possession of the sovereignty, and for that purpose formed a conspiracy against the life of Peter, which terminated in her own ruin. The young Peter assembled some troops, severely punished the conspirators, confined Sophia in a monastery, and leaving only an empty title to his brother Ivan, made himself master of the empire in the year 1689.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 35, p. 474.

6041. WOMAN, Avaricious. Wife of James II. [The rebellion of the Duke of Monmouth filled Jeffreys' courts with victims.] It could [not] be shown that, in the season of her [Mary's] greatness, she saved, or even tried to save, one single victim from the most frightful proscription that England has ever seen. Unhappily, the only request that she is known to have preferred touching the rebels was that a hundred of those who were sentenced to transportation might be given to her. The profit which she cleared on the cargo, after making large allowance for those who died of hunger and fever during the passage, cannot be estimated at less than a thousand guineas. We cannot wonder that her attendants should have imitated her unprinciply greediness and her unwomanly cruelty.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 606.

6042. WOMAN, Bravery of. Jane de Montfort. The defence of the castle of Hennebon by Jane de Montfort, during the captivity of her husband, is one of the most interesting episodes of the wars in which England was engaged. The historian and the artist have delighted to exhibit the heroic duchess, . . . with "the courage of a man and the heart of a lion," showing to the people of Rennes her infant boy, and saying, "See here my little son, who shall be the restorer of his father," . . . at the last extremity looking down along the sea, out of a window in the castle, and crying aloud, smiling for great joy, "I see the succors of England coming!"—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 29, p. 455.

6043. ——. Wife of William Purefoy. [In 1642, at the beginning of the civil war, the wife of William Purefoy, a member of the House of Commons, defended her house against Prince Rupert and four hundred Cavaliers.] The little garrison consisted of the brave lady and her two daughters, her son-in-law, eight male servants, and a few females. They had twelve muskets, which the women loaded as the men discharged them from the windows. The out-buildings were set on fire, and the house would have been burnt, had not the lady gone forth and claimed the protection of the Cavaliers. [Prince] Rupert respected her courage, and would not suffer her property to be plundered. [Her home was in the north of Warwickshire. Her husband was absent.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 1, p. 1.

6044. WOMAN, Charity of. Læta. [During the invasion of the Barbarians Rome] gradually experienced the distress of scarcity, and at length the horrid calamities of famine. The daily allowance of three pounds of bread was reduced to one half, to one third, to nothing; and the price of corn still continued to rise in a rapid and extravagant proportion. The poorer citizens, who were unable to purchase the necessities of life, solicited the precarious charity of the rich; and for a while the public misery was alleviated by the humanity of Læta, the widow of the Emperor Gratian, who had fixed her residence at Rome, and consecrated to the use of the indigent the princely revenue which she annually received from the grateful successors of her husband.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 31, p. 269.

6045. WOMAN, Compassion of. Nero's Nurses. As Robespierre was lamented by his landlady, so even Nero was tenderly buried by two nurses who had known him in the exquisite beauty of his engaging childhood, and by Acte, who had inspired his youth with a genuine love.—FARRAR'S EARLY DAYS, ch. 4, p. 44.

6046. WOMAN, Converts by. Clotilda. Clovis, the Merovingian prince, had contracted a fortunate alliance with the fair Clotilda, the niece of the King of Burgundy, who . . . was educated in the profession of the Catholic faith. It was her interest, as well as her duty, to achieve the conversion of a pagan husband ; and Clovis insensibly listened to the voice of love and religion. He consented . . . to the baptism of his eldest son ; and though the sudden death of the infant excited some superstitious fears, he was persuaded, a second time, to repeat the dangerous experiment. In the distress of the battle of Tolbiac Clovis loudly invoked the God of Clotilda and the Christians ; and victory disposed him to hear, with respectful gratitude, the eloquent Remigius, Bishop of Rheims, who forcibly displayed the temporal and spiritual advantages of his conversion. The king declared himself satisfied of the truth of the Catholic faith ; and the political reasons which might have suspended his public profession were removed by the devout or loyal acclamations of the Franks, who showed themselves alike prepared to follow their heroic leader to the field of battle or to the baptismal font.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 38, p. 574.

6047. WOMAN at Court. Lady Hamilton. [When Nelson sought water and provisions for his fleet in Sicily,] the Neapolitan ministry, dreading to offend the French Directory, refused the supplies which he required before he again started in pursuit of the fleet [of Bonaparte]. Sir William Hamilton was [English] minister at Naples ; his wife was the favorite with the Queen of Naples, and one of the most attractive of the ladies of that luxurious court. Nelson had slight acquaintance with Lady Hamilton, and upon his representations of the urgent necessity for victualling his fleet, secret instructions were given that he should be supplied with all that he required. [Nelson afterward urged her claims upon the national gratitude, because the success of his brilliant action of the Nile was owing to her, as he must otherwise have gone to Gibraltar to refit, and the enemy would have escaped.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 20, p. 355.

6048. WOMAN, Cruelty of. Parysatis. [She was the mother of the murdered Cyrus. A Carian soldier boasted that he had killed Cyrus.] Animated by a barbarous spirit of vengeance, she commanded the executioners to take that unfortunate wretch, and to make him suffer the most exquisite tortures during ten days ; then after they had torn out his eyes, to pour melted brass into his ears, till he expired in that cruel agony ; which was accordingly executed. [Messabates, the eunuch, had, by the king's order, cut off the hand and head of Cyrus.] As soon as she got him into her hands, before the king could have the least suspicion of the revenge she meditated, she delivered him to the executioners, and commanded them to flay him alive, to lay him afterward upon three cross-bars, and to stretch his skin before his eyes upon stakes prepared for that purpose ; which was performed accordingly.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 2, § 7.

6049. WOMAN a Custodian. Of Man. [When Fabius Maximus commanded the Roman army against Hannibal.] One day his officers informed him that one of his courtiers . . . often quitted his post, and rambled out of the camp. Upon this report, he asked what kind of a man he was in other respects ; and they all declared it was not easy to find so good a soldier, doing him the justice to mention several extraordinary instances of his valor. On inquiring into the cause of this irregularity, he found that the man was passionately in love, and that, for the sake of seeing a young woman, he ventured out of the camp, and took a long and dangerous journey every night. Hereupon Fabius gave orders to some of his men to find out the woman, and convey her into his own tent, but took care that the Lucanian should not know it. Then he sent for him, and taking him aside, spoke to him as follows : " I very well know that you have lain many nights out of the camp, in breach of the Roman discipline and laws ; at the same time, I am not ignorant of your past services. In consideration of them, I forgive your present crime ; but for the future I will give you in charge to a person who shall be answerable for you." While the soldier stood much amazed, Fabius produced the woman, and putting her in his hands, thus expressed himself : " This is the person who engages for you that you will remain in camp ; and now we shall see whether there was not some traitorous design which drew you out, and which you made the love of this woman a cloak for."—PLUTARCH'S FABIUS MAXIMUS.

6050. WOMAN, Dangerous. Cleopatra. He cited Cleopatra before him, to answer for the conduct of her governors, and sent one of his lieutenants to oblige her to come to him in Cilicia, whither he was going to assemble the States of that province. That step was, from its consequences, very fatal to Antony, and completed his ruin. His love for Cleopatra having awakened passions in him till then concealed or asleep, inflamed them even to madness, and finally deadened and extinguished the few sparks of honor and virtue which he might perhaps still retain. Cleopatra, assured of her charms by the proof she had already so successfully made of them upon Julius Cæsar, was in hopes that she could also very easily captivate Antony. . . . Never was equipage more splendid and magnificent than hers. The stern of her ship flamed with gold, the sails were purple, and the oars inlaid with silver. A pavilion of cloth of gold was raised upon the deck, under which appeared the queen, robed like Venus, and surrounded with the most beautiful virgins of her court, of whom some represented the Nereides, and others the Graces. Instead of trumpets were heard flutes, hautboys, harps, and other such instruments of music, warbling the softest airs, to which the oars kept time, and rendered the harmony more agreeable. Perfumes were burning on the deck, which spread their odors to a great distance upon the river.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 24, § 3.

6051. WOMAN, Device of. Ariadne. Androgeus being treacherously slain in Attica, a very fatal war was carried on against that country by Minos, and divine vengeance laid it waste ; for it was visited by famine and pestilence, and want of water increased their misery. The remedy that Apollo proposed was, that they should appease Minos, and be reconciled to him, whereupon the wrath of Heaven would cease, and their calamities come to a period. In consequence of this, they sent ambassadors with their submission, and . . . engaged themselves by treaty to send every ninth year a tribute of seven young men and as many virgins. When these were brought into Crete, the fabulous account informs us that they were destroyed by the Minotaur in the Labyrinth, or that, lost in its mazes, and unable to find the way out, they perished there. The Minotaur was, as Euripides tells us,

A mingled form, prodigious to behold,
Half bull, half man !

When the time of the third tribute came, . . . Theseus, who, to express his regard for justice, and take his share in the common fortune, voluntarily offered himself as one of the seven, without lot. [The conditions on which the tribute would be remitted were these :] That the Athenians should furnish a vessel, and the young men embark and sail along with him, but carry no arms; and that if they could kill the Minotaur, there should be an end of the tribute. There appearing no hopes of safety for the youths in the two former tributes, they sent out a ship with a black sail, as carrying them to certain ruin. But when Theseus encouraged his father by his confidence of success against the Minotaur he gave another sail, a white one, to the pilot, ordering him, if he brought Theseus safe back, to hoist the white; but if not to sail with the black one in token of his misfortune. . . . When he arrived in Crete, according to most historians and poets, Ariadne, falling in love with him, gave him a clew of thread, and instructed him how to pass with it through the intricacies of the labyrinth. Thus assisted, he killed the Minotaur, and then set sail, carrying off Ariadne, together with the young men.—PLUTARCH'S CAIUS MARCIUS.

6052. WOMAN, Dominion of. James II. [His favorite mistress was Sarah Jennings.] Among the gallants who sued for her favor, Churchill [afterward Duke of Marlborough], young, handsome, graceful, insinuating, eloquent, and brave, obtained the preference. He must have been enamored indeed; for he had little property, except the annuity which he had bought with the infamous wages bestowed on him by the Duchess of Cleveland; he was insatiable of riches; Sarah was poor; and a plain girl with a large fortune was proposed to him. His love, after a struggle, prevailed over his avarice; marriage only strengthened his passion; and to the last hour of his life Sarah enjoyed the pleasure and distinction of being the one human being who was able to mislead that far-sighted and sure-footed judgment, who was fervently loved by that cold heart, and who was servilely feared by that intrepid spirit. [See No. 6077.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 237.

6053. WOMAN, Energetic. Washington's Mother. He was brought up in a very hardy, sensible manner, on an enormous farm, not a fourth part of which was cultivated. His father dying when he was eleven years old, he came directly under the influence of his mother, who was one of the women of whom people say, "There is no nonsense about her." She was a plain, illiterate, energetic, strong-willed lady, perfectly capable of conducting the affairs of a farm, and scorning the help of others.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 11.

6054. WOMAN, Executive. Mother of Washington. To the pressing entreaties of her son that she would make Mount Vernon the home of her old age, the matron replied: "I thank you for your affectionate, dutiful offers, but my wants are few in this world, and I feel perfectly competent to take care of myself." Upon her son-in-law, Colonel Fielding Lewis, proposing that he should relieve her in the direction of her [farm] affairs, she observed: "Do you, Fielding, keep my books in order, for your eyesight is better than mine, but leave the executive management to me."—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 1.

6055. WOMAN, Extraordinary. Zenobia. [Zenobia was the celebrated Queen of Palmyra and the East.] Modern Europe has produced several illustrious women who have sustained with glory the weight of empire; nor is our own age destitute of such distinguished characters. But if we except the doubtful achievements of Semiramis, Zenobia is perhaps the only female whose superior genius broke through the servile indolence imposed on her sex by the climate and manners of Asia. She claimed her descent from the Macedonian kings of Egypt, equalled in beauty her ancestor Cleopatra, and far surpassed that princess in chastity and valor. Zenobia was esteemed the most lovely as well as the most heroic of her sex. She was of a dark complexion. Her teeth were of a pearly whiteness, and her large black eyes sparkled with uncommon fire, tempered by the most attractive sweetness. Her voice was strong and harmonious. Her manly understanding was strengthened and adorned by study. She was not ignorant of the Latin tongue, but possessed in equal perfection the Greek, the Syriac, and the Egyptian languages. She had drawn up for her own use an epitome of Oriental history, and familiarly compared the beauties of Homer and Plato under the tuition of the sublime Longinus.—GIBBON, ch. 11, p. 350.

6056. WOMAN, A ferocious. Hind. [After one of Mahomet's battles.] The ferocious heroine, Hind, sought the body of Hamza, the murderer of her father, who was slain in turn by the arrow of the negro slave Wahchi. She discovers it, rushes upon the carcass, lays open the side with a sabre blow, plucks out the heart, and tears it with her teeth. Then, taking from her own neck and arms the bracelets and necklaces that adorned them, she gives them to the black slave, and substitutes them with a necklace and bracelets made of the ears of the dead enemy.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 116.

6057. WOMAN, Firmness of. Theodora. [A rebellion broke out in Constantinople, and the Emperor] Justinian was lost if [his wife] the prostitute whom he raised from the theatre had not renounced the timidity as well as the virtues of her sex. In the midst of a council, where Belisarius was present, Theodora alone displayed the spirit of a hero; and she alone, without apprehending his future hatred, could save the emperor from the imminent danger and his unworthy fears. "If flight," said the consort of Justinian, "were the only means of safety, yet I should disdain to fly. Death is the condition of our birth; but they who have reigned should never survive the loss of dignity and dominion. I implore Heaven that I may never be seen, not a day, without my diadem and purples; that I may no longer behold the light when I cease to be saluted with the name of queen. If you resolve, O Cæsar! to fly, you have treasures; behold the sea, you have ships; but tremble lest the desire of life should expose you to wretched exile and ignominious death. For my own part, I adhere to the maxim of antiquity, that the throne is a glorious sepulchre." The firmness of a woman restored the courage to deliberate and act, and courage soon discovers the resources of the most desperate situation.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 63.

6058. WOMAN forgotten. Mrs. Samuel Adams. Samuel Adams married young, and while he devoted himself to politics, it was chiefly the industry and economy of his wife that supported the family. And yet this good and true wife, to whom not merely her husband, but the community, stood greatly indebted, has attracted so little the notice of biographers, that we are unable to give even her name.—"SAMUEL ADAMS," AMERICAN CYCLOPEDIA.

6059. WOMAN, The greatest. Napoleon I. Madame de Staël challenged me, in the midst of a numerous circle, to tell her who was the greatest woman in the world. I looked at her and coldly replied, "She, madame, who has borne the greatest number of children."—ABBOTT'S NAPOLÉON B., vol. 1, ch. 35.

6060. WOMAN, Helpful. Isabella. The idea of reaching the Indies by crossing the Atlantic had already possessed him [Columbus]. For more than ten years the poor enthusiast was a beggar, going from court to court, explaining to dull monarchs and bigoted monks the figure of the earth and the ease with which the rich island of the East might be reached by sailing westward. He found one appreciative listener, afterward his constant and faithful friend, the noble and sympathetic Isabella, Queen of Castile. Be it never forgotten that to the faith and insight and decision of a woman the final success of Columbus must be attributed.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 3, p. 55.

6061. WOMAN honored. Tomb. The Taj . . . [in India], said to be the most beautiful building in the world, . . . was built as a tomb by the emperor Shah Jehar . . . for his wife, whom he loved with an idolatrous affection. He had promised her on her death-bed to erect to her memory such a mausoleum as the world had never before seen. He kept his word. . . . It cost, it is stated, exclusive of labor, $15,000,000. To-day, with paid labor, it would cost $50,000,000. In this country [America] it could not have been built for probably twice this sum.—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 300.

6062. WOMAN, An indiscreet. Frances Jennings. Frances had been distinguished by beauty and levity even among the crowd of beautiful faces and light characters which adorned and disgraced Whitehall during the wild carnival of the Restoration. On one occasion Frances dressed herself like an orange girl, and cried fruit about the streets. Sober people predicted that a girl of so little discretion and delicacy would not easily find a husband. [She was, however, twice married, and was now the wife of Tyrconnel. She was the sister of Sarah, the favorite mistress of James II.]—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 3, p. 236.

6063. WOMAN, Infamous. Lady Castlemaine. Lord Castlemaine . . . was, indeed, well acquainted with Rome, and was, for a layman, deeply read in theological controversy. But he had none of the address which his post required [as English minister], and even had he been a diplomatist of the greatest ability, there was a circumstance which would have disqualified him for the particular mission on which he had been sent. He was known all over Europe as the husband of the most shameless of women, and he was known in no other way.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 245.

6064. ———. Messalina. Messalina, also, the vicious and abandoned wife of Claudius, urged him on to various acts of injustice and cruelty. This woman was infamous for all manner of vices. Her debaucheries, which were quite notorious in Rome, exceed all belief; but, what is the most surprising part of her character, she had the address to pass with Claudius as a paragon of virtue. She at length, however, proceeded to that height of effrontery, that during a short absence of Claudius she publicly married Caius Silius, and upon the emperor's return made him, by way of jest, to sign the marriage contract. Narcissus, his freedman, soon made him sensible that the matter was too serious, by informing him that the people no longer looked upon him as emperor. Utterly unable to act for himself, he now entreated that Narcissus would take any steps he judged best for his interest, and his favorite, thus invested with authority, immediately secured the Prætorian guards, and caused Messalina and Silius, her gallant, to be put to death.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 1, p. 486.

6065. ———. Cleopatra. What a monster was this princess! The most odious of vices were united in her person: an avowed disregard of modesty, breach of faith, injustice, cruelty, and, what crowns all the rest, the false exterior of a deceitful friendship, which covers a fixed design of delivering up to his enemy the person she loads with the most tender caresses and with marks of the warmest and most sincere attachment. Such are the effects of ambition, which was her predominant vice.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 24, § 3.

6066. ———. Catharine de' Medici. Catharine, finding herself in direct collision with the admiral [Coligny], whose paramount credit with the king threatened her with a total loss of power, finally resolved on his destruction. No doubt the idea of this crime had often been suggested to her mind before; it had now become a necessity; and she executed it with a cool determination, combined with Machiavelian subtlety, which will transmit her name to posterity branded with peculiar and indelible infamy. Her chief confidants were her son, the Duke of Anjou (afterward Henry III.), the Duke of Guise, the Marshal de Tavannes, the Count de Retz, and the Duke of Nevers. It was arranged that the admiral should be assassinated by some known retainer of the Guises; this would almost certainly produce an insurrection of the Huguenots to avenge the death of their leader; the populace of Paris was then to be instigated to rise in defence of the Guises; and the weaker party was to be crushed and exterminated by a wholesale massacre.

Such was the scheme of these diabolical conspirators.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 16, § 10.

6067. WOMAN, Infatuated by. Roman Mark Antony. Antony, . . . intoxicated with Eastern luxury and debauchery, was daily sinking in the esteem of his army. In the madness of his passion for Cleopatra, he had proclaimed her queen of Egypt, Cyprus, Africa, and Cœlo-Syria, and lavished kingdoms and provinces on the children that were the fruit of her various amours. . . . The imprudent measure he now took in divorcing his wife Octavia, the sister of his colleague, was a justifiable cause for their coming to an open rupture, and appealing to the sword to decide their claim to undivided sovereignty of the empire. Octavius had foreseen this issue, and made formidable preparations, which Antony had supinely neglected. He trusted chiefly to his fleet, and was persuaded by Cleopatra to rest the fortune of the war on a naval engagement, which was fought near Actium in Epirus. In the heat of the battle, which was maintained for some time with equal spirit, Cleopatra, with her Egyptian armament of sixty galleys, took to flight, and, what is scarcely conceivable, such was the infatuation of Antony, that he followed her, leaving his fleet to fight for themselves.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 3, p. 420.

6068. WOMAN, An injured. Wife of James II. [Mary was jealous of the infamous Catharine Sedley, the king's mistress.] She did not even attempt to conceal from the eyes of the world the violence of her emotions. Day after day the courtiers who came to see her dine observed that the dishes were removed untasted from the table. She suffered the tears to stream down her cheeks unconcealed in the presence of the whole circle of courtiers and envoys. To the king she spoke with wild vehemence. "Let me go," she cried. "You have made your woman a countess; make her a queen! Put my crown on her head! Only let me hide myself in some convent, where I may never see her more."—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 66.

6069. WOMAN, Injustice to. Henry VIII. [Of the pope's legates he sought a divorce.] King and queen were cited to appear before them when the court again met on the 18th of June. Henry briefly announced his resolve to live no longer in mortal sin. The queen offered an appeal to Clement, and on the refusal of the legates to admit it, flung herself at Henry's feet. "Sire," said Catharine [of Aragon], "I beseech you to pity me, a woman and a stranger, without an assured friend, and without an indifferent counsellor. I take God to witness that I have always been to you a true and loyal wife; that I have made it my constant duty to seek your pleasure; that I have loved all whom you loved, whether I have reason or not, whether they are friends to me or foes. I have been your wife for years; I have brought you many children. God knows that when I came to your bed I was a virgin, and I put it to your own conscience to say whether it was not so. If there be any offence which can be alleged against me, I consent to depart with infamy; if not, then I pray you to do me justice." The pitiful appeal was wasted on a king who was already entertaining Anne Boleyn with royal state in his own palace.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 552.

6070. WOMAN, Invention of. Silk-weaving. Till the reign of Justinian the silk-worms who feed on the leaves of the white mulberry tree were confined to China; those of the pine, the oak, and the ash were common in the forests both of Asia and Europe; but as their education is more difficult, and their produce more uncertain, they were generally neglected, except in the little island of Ceos, near the coast of Attica. A thin gauze was procured from their webs, and this Cœan manufacture, the invention of a woman, for female use, was long admired both in the East and at Rome.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 40, p. 66.

6071. WOMAN, A miserable. Sarah Jennings. [See No. 6052.] Sarah was lively and voluble, domineered over those whom she regarded with most kindness, and when she was offended vented her rage in tears and tempestuous reproaches. To sanctify she made no pretence, and, indeed, narrowly escaped the imputation of irreligion. She was not yet what she became when one class of vices had been fully developed in her by prosperity, and another by adversity; when her brain had been turned by success and flattery; when her heart had been ulcerated by disasters and mortifications. She lived to be that most odious and miserable of human beings, an ancient crone at war with her whole kind, at war with her own children and grandchildren, great indeed, and rich, but valuing greatness and riches chiefly because they enabled her to brave public opinion, and to indulge without restraint her hatred to the living and the dead.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 237.

6072. WOMAN in Misfortune. Cornelia. There is no female character on whom the ancient writers have lavished more praise than on Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, of whose greatness of mind under the severest misfortunes they speak in terms of the highest eulogy. She had seen the funerals of twelve of her children, the last of whom were Tiberius and Caius Gracchus. While her friends were lamenting her misfortunes, "Call not me unfortunate," said she; "I shall never cease to think myself a happy woman, who have been the mother of the Gracchi." Imprudent and dangerous for themselves as she must have thought the conduct of her sons, she most naturally deemed it the result of real virtue and patriotism. Plutarch informs us that she spent the remaining years of her life in a villa, near Misenum, visited, respected, and beloved by the most eminent men, both Greeks and Romans, and honored by interchanging presents even with foreign princes. Her conversation was delightful when she recounted anecdotes of her father Africanus; but all were astonished when she spoke freely of her sons, of their great deeds and their untimely fate, and this without ever shedding a tear. "It was thought by some," continues Plutarch, "that the pressure of age and misfortune had deadened her maternal feelings; but they" (he adds) "who were of that weak opinion were ignorant that a superior mind, enlightened by a liberal education, can rise above all the calamities of life; and that though fortune may sometimes oppress virtue, she cannot deprive her of that serenity and resolution which never forsake her in the day of adversity."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1, p. 388.

6073. WOMAN, A monstrous. Mary "the Bloody." Mary, who inherited the cruel and tyrannical disposition of her father, began her reign by putting to death her cousin Jane, together with her father-in-law and husband. This outset was a prognostic of the temper of her reign, which was one continued scene of bloodshed and persecution. The Protestants, who had multiplied exceedingly during the short reign of Edward, were persecuted with the most sanguinary rigor. It was a doctrine of Mary's, as Bishop Burnet informs us, that as the souls of heretics are afterward to be eternally burning in hell, there could be nothing more proper than to imitate the divine vengeance, by burning them on earth. In the course of this reign it is computed that about eight hundred persons were burnt alive in England. Yet this monster of a woman died in peace, with the consideration, no doubt, of having merited eternal happiness as a reward of that zeal she had shown in support of the true religion.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 20, p. 303.

6074. WOMAN opposed. Queen Mary (Stuart). With the actual outbreak of persecution and the death of Cranmer all restraint was thrown aside. In his "First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women," [John] Knox denounced Mary as a Jezebel, a traitress, and a bastard. He declared the rule of women to be against the law of nature and of God. The duty, whether of the estates or people of the realm, was "first to remove from honor and authority that monster in nature; secondarily, if any presume to defend that impiety, they ought not to fear, first to pronounce, then after to execute against them the sentence of death." To keep the oath of allegiance was "nothing but plain rebellion against God."—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 684.

6075. WOMAN, Patriotism of. Maria Theresa. [When the Franco-Bavarians invaded Austria, and won their way within a few leagues of the gates of Vienna, the proud house of Austria seemed doomed to inevitable and total ruin. At this crisis the young Queen of Hungary displayed an intrepidity and heroism worthy of her illustrious race. She repaired to the Hungarian Diet at Presburg, harangued the assembly in pathetic and stirring language, and commended herself, her children, and the cause of the empire to their well-known patriotism, fidelity, and courage. The gallant Magyars responded with tumultuous enthusiasm, waving their sabres, and shouting, "We will die for our king Maria Theresa!" The population rose en masse, and the movement spreading into Croatia and Dalmatia, a powerful army was soon marshalled for the defence of the empire.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 23, § 11.]

6076. WOMAN, A perfect. Cadijah. [Wife of Mahomet.] During the twenty-four years of their marriage her youthful husband abstained from the right of polygamy, and the pride or tenderness of the venerable matron was never insulted by the society of a rival. After her death he placed her in the rank of the four perfect women, with the sister of Moses, the mother of Jesus, and Fatima, the best beloved of his daughters. "Was she not old?" said Ayesha, with the insolence of a blooming beauty; "has not God given you a better in her place?" "No, by God," said Mahomet, with an effusion of honest gratitude; "there never can be a better! She believed in me when men despised me; she relieved my wants when I was poor and persecuted by the world."—GIBBON'S MAHOMET, p. 56.

6077. — —. Queen Mary. [When Queen Mary was fatally sick of the small-pox, her husband, William III., "called me," says Burnet, "into his closet, and gave vent to a most tender passion. He said during the whole course of their marriage he had never known one single fault in her." [William was carried out in a fit when she died.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 11, p. 174.]

6078. WOMAN, A philosophic. Hypatia. Hypatia, the daughter of Theon the mathematician, was initiated in her father's studies; her learned comments have elucidated the geometry of Apollonius and Diophantus, and she publicly taught, both at Athens and Alexandria, the philosophy of Plato and Aristotle. In the bloom of beauty and in the maturity of wisdom the modest maid refused her lovers and instructed her disciples; the persons most illustrious for their rank or merit were impatient to visit the female philosopher; and Cyril beheld, with a jealous eye, the gorgeous train of horses and slaves who crowded the door of her academy.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 47, p. 502.

6079. WOMAN in Politics. Louis XV. In 1743 the . . . influence which really predominated in the State was that of the king's mistress, the Duchess of Châteauroux, the youngest of four sisters of the family of Nesle, who had successively yielded to his licentious passion.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 23, § 12.

6080. — —. Louis XV. In 1749 the royal affections were transferred . . . to a new mistress, Madame Lenormant d'Étioles, a person of low birth, but of decided talent and great accomplishments, who was soon afterward created Marchioness of Pompadour. Louis abandoned himself slavishly to her influence, and for twenty years she was the most powerful personage in France. All the great affairs of State were discussed and arranged under her guidance. Generals, ministers, ambassadors, transacted business in her boudoir; she dispensed the whole patronage of the government; the rich prizes of the Church, of the army, of the magistrature were to be obtained solely through her favor.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 20, § 1.

6081. — —. Overthrow of Lord Clarendon. His overthrow "was certainly designed in Lady Castlemaine's chamber;" and as he retired at noonday from the audience of dismission, she ran undressed from her bed into her aviary, to enjoy the spectacle of the fallen minister, and "bless herself at the old man's going away." The gallants of Whitehall crowded to "talk to her in her bird-cage." "You," said they to her, as they glanced at the retiring chancellor—"you are the bird of passage."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 2, ch. 17.

6082. WOMAN, Power of. Aspasia. The celebrated Aspasia, first the mistress and afterward the wife of Pericles, had from her extraordinary talents a great ascendancy over his mind, and was supposed frequently to have dictated his counsels in the most important concerns of the State. She was believed to have formed a society of courtesans, whose influence over their gallants, young men of consideration in the republic, she thus rendered subservient to the political views of Pericles. . . . Such were the powers of her mind and the fascinating charms of her conversation that even before her marriage, and while exercising the trade of a courtesan, her house was the frequent resort of the gravest and most respectable of the Athenian citizens; among the rest, of the virtuous Socrates.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 2, p. 147.

6083. ——. Cleopatra. The passion which Cæsar had conceived for that princess was probably the sole cause of his embarking in so dangerous a war [with the Egyptians]. He had by her one son, called Cæsarion, whom Augustus caused to be put to death when he became master of Alexandria. His affection for Cleopatra kept him much longer in Egypt than his affairs required. . . . Cæsar passed whole nights in feasting with Cleopatra. Having embarked with her upon the Nile, he carried her through the country with a numerous fleet, and would have penetrated into Ethiopia if his army had not refused to follow him. He had resolved to bring her to Rome, and to marry her; and intended to have caused a law to pass in the assembly of the people, by which the citizens of Rome should be permitted to marry such and as many wives as they thought fit.—ROLLEN'S HIST., Book 24, § 2.

6084. ——. James II. At the moment of the king's accession, a sense of the new responsibility which lay on him made his mind for a time peculiarly open to religious impressions. He formed and announced many good resolutions, spoke in public with great severity of the impious and licentious manners of the age, and in private assured his queen and his confessor that he would see Catharine Sedley no more. He wrote to his mistress entreating her to quit the apartments which she occupied at Whitehall, and to go to a house in Saint James' Square, which had been splendidly furnished for her at his expense. He at the same time promised to allow her a large pension from his privy purse. Catharine, clever, strong-minded, independent, and conscious of her power, refused to stir.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 64.

6085. WOMAN, Power of a wicked. King's Mistress. [Mademoiselle Queronaille was one of the favorite mistresses of Charles II.] Incredible as it may appear, there is a record of particular payments to her out of the secret service money, in the one year of 1681, of £136,668 10s.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 20, p. 325.

6086. WOMAN, Praise of. Mrs. President Jackson. The remains were interred in the garden of the Hermitage, in a tomb which the general had recently completed. The tablet which covers her dust contains the following inscription: "Here lie the remains of Mrs. Rachel Jackson, wife of President Jackson, who died the 22d of December, 1828, aged 61. Her face was fair, her person pleasing, her temper amiable, her heart kind; she delighted in relieving the wants of her fellow-creatures, and cultivated that divine pleasure by the most liberal and unpretending methods; to the poor she was a benefactor; to the rich an example; to the wretched a comforter; to the prosperous an ornament; her piety went hand in hand with her benevolence, and she thanked her Creator for being permitted to do good. A being so gentle and so virtuous slander might wound but not dishonor. Even death, when he tore her from the arms of her husband, could but transport her to the bosom of her God." Andrew Jackson was never the same man again. During his presidency he never used the phrase, "By the Eternal," nor any other language which could be considered profane. He mourned his wife until he himself rejoined her in the tomb he had prepared for them both.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 540.

6087. WOMAN, Protected by. Pocahontas. It was necessary that the sanction of the Indian emperor should be given to the sentence, and [Captain John] Smith was now taken twenty-five miles down the river to a town where Powhatan lived in winter. The savage monarch was now sixty years of age, and, to use Smith's own language, looked every inch a king. He received the prisoner with all the rude formalities peculiar to his race. Going to the Long House of the village, the emperor, clad in a robe of raccoon skins, took his seat on a kind of throne, prepared for the occasion. His two daughters sat right and left, while files of warriors and women of rank were ranged round the hall. The king solemnly reviewed the cause, and confirmed the sentence of death. Two large stones were brought into the hall; Smith was dragged forth, bound, and his head put into position to be crushed by a war-club. A stalwart painted savage was ordered out of the rank, and stood ready for the bloody tragedy. The signal was given, the grim executioner raised his bludgeon, and another moment had decided the fate of both the illustrious captive and his colony. But the peril went by harmless. Matoaka [Pocahontas], the eldest daughter of Powhatan, sprang from her seat and rushed between the warrior's uplifted club and the prostrate prisoner. She clasped his head in her arms, and held on with the resolution of despair until her father, yielding to her frantic appeals, ordered Smith to be unbound and lifted up. Again he was rescued from a terrible death.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 9, p. 100.

6088. WOMAN, A remarkable. Thejiah. [After the death of Mahomet] an Arab woman of Mesopotamia, named Thejiah, declared herself seized with the prophetic spirit, and submitting the Arabs of Syria to her inspirations, was marching at the head of an army, fanaticised by her eloquence and her beauty, against Yemen.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 159.

6089. ——. Mary Stuart. If another Homer were to arise, and if the poet were to seek another Helen for the subject of a modern epic of war, religion, and love, he would beyond all find her in Mary Stuart, the most beautiful, the weakest, the most attractive and most attracted of women, raising around her, by her irresistible fascinations, a whirlwind of love, ambition, and jealousy, in which her lovers became, each in his turn, the motive, the instrument, and the victim of a crime; leaving, like the Greek

Helen, the arms of a murdered husband for those of his murderer ; sowing the seeds of internecine, religious, and foreign war at every step, and closing by a saintly death the life of a Clytemnestra.—LAMARTINE'S QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 1.

6090. WOMAN, Rescued by. Charles II. [After the defeat of Charles II. at the battle of Worcester he fled to Morsey in disguise. Here he was in great danger because of the presence of the soldiers of the Commonwealth. He disguised himself as a decent serving-man, who was to convey his mistress, the daughter of Colonel Lane, to a relation near Bristol. The lady rode on a pillion behind him. By her assistance he escaped to France, and saved his head.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 9, p. 141.

6091. WOMAN, Restraints for. Samuel Johnson. Mrs. Knowles affected to complain that men had much more liberty allowed them than women. JOHNSON: "Why, madam, women have all the liberty they should wish to have. We have all the labor and the danger, and the women all the advantage. We go to sea, we build houses, we do everything, in short, to pay our court to the women." MRS. KNOWLES: "The Doctor reasons very wittily, but not convincingly. Now, take the instance of building: the mason's wife, if she is ever seen in liquor, is ruined; the mason may get himself drunk as often as he pleases, with little loss of character; nay, may let his wife and children starve." JOHNSON: "Madam, you must consider if the mason does get himself drunk, and let his wife and children starve, the parish will oblige him to find security for their maintenance. We have different modes of restraining evil. Stocks for the men, a ducking-stool for women, and a pound for beasts. If we require more perfection from women than from ourselves, it is doing them honor. And women have not the same temptations that we have: they may always live in virtuous company; men must mix in the world indiscriminately. If a woman has no inclination to do what is wrong, being secured from it is no restraint to her."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 379.

6092. WOMAN, A revengeful. Assassination. The Duchess of Montpensier, a woman of masculine energy and resolution, spared no pains to inflame to the utmost the angry passions of the multitude against Henry III., who had shed her brother's blood; and among other expedients, strong appeals were made to the fanaticism of the priesthood and religious orders. [She obtained his death by the hand of a Dominican monk.]—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 17, § 14.

6093. WOMAN, Rights of. Early Romans. [During the reign of Numa complaints were made against the women.] Their behavior is said to have been too bold and too masculine, in particular to their husbands. For they considered themselves as absolute mistresses in their houses; nay, they wanted a share in affairs of State, and delivered their sentiments with great freedom concerning the most weighty matters.—PLUTARCH'S NUMA AND LYCURGUS.

6094. WOMAN, Rule of. King of Navarre. [In France the] acknowledged chief [of the Reformation] was no less a personage than the first prince of the blood, Antoine de Bourbon, . . . who had become King of Navarre. . . . His wife [Jean d'Albret], who had been carefully educated in the Reformed doctrines by her mother, Marguerite of Valois, induced him to embrace her faith; and his younger brother, Louis, Prince of Condé, being in like manner converted by the example and persuasions of his wife, declared himself a zealous member of the party.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 15, § 8.

6095. ——. Queen of Scots. [John Knox before Queen Mary.] "I would," said the queen, "my words might have the same effect upon you as yours have upon Scotland; we should then understand each other, become friends, and our good intelligence would do much for the peace and happiness of the kingdom!" "Madam," replied the stern apostle, "words are more barren than the rock when they are only worldly; but when inspired by God, thence proceed the flower, the grain, and all virtues! I have travelled over Germany; I know the Saxon law, which is just, for it reserves the sceptre for man alone, and only gives to woman a place at the hearth and a distaff!"—thus plainly declaring that he saw in her only a usurper, and that he was himself a republican of the theocratic order. . . . The queen, alarmed at the impotence of her charms, her words, and her rank on the mailed heart of fanaticism, wept like a child before the sectary; her tears moved but did not discourage him; he continued to preach with wild freedom against the government of women and the pomps of the palace.—LAMARTINE'S QUEEN OF SCOTS, p. 12.

6096. WOMAN, Sagacious. Thracian. A party of Thracians demolished the house of Timoclea, a woman of quality and honor. The soldiers carried off the booty; and the captain, after having violated the lady, asked her whether she had not some gold and silver concealed. She said she had; and taking him alone into the garden, showed him a well, into which, she told him, she had thrown everything of value when the city was taken. The officer stooped down to examine the well; upon which she pushed him in, and then despatched him with stones. The Thracians, coming up, seized and bound her hands, and carried her before Alexander, who immediately perceived by her look and gait, and the fearless manner in which she followed that savage crew, that she was a woman of quality and superior sentiments. The king demanded who she was. She answered: "I am the sister of Theagenes, who, in capacity of general, fought Philip for the liberty of Greece, and fell in the battle of Chæronea." Alexander, admiring her answer and the bold action she had performed, commanded her to be set at liberty and her children with her.—PLUTARCH'S ALEXANDER.

6097. WOMAN, Saved by. Fulvia. The conspirator Catiline had brought his plot to maturity. Troops were levied, arms provided, a distinct department and function was assigned to each of the principal conspirators, and a day was fixed for the commencement of operations in the heart of Rome. The city was to be set fire to in a hundred different quarters at once; the consuls were to be assassinated; and an immense list was prepared of the chief citizens who were doomed to instantaneous destruction. A plot of this nature, in which so many were concerned, could not long be kept secret. Fulvia, a woman of loose character, the mistress of one of the conspirators, probably gained by the spies of Cicero, gave notice to the consuls of the whole plan of the conspiracy. The Senate passed that powerful decree which armed the consuls with dictatorial authority for the safety of the republic.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 4, ch. 1, p. 398.

6098. WOMAN, Scholarly. Queen Elizabeth. At sixteen she already showed "a man's power of application" to her books. She had read almost the whole of Cicero and a great part of Livy. She began the day with the study of the New Testament in Greek, and followed this up by reading selected orations of Isocrates and the tragedies of Sophocles. She could speak Latin with fluency and Greek moderately well. Her love of classical culture lasted through her life. Amid the press and cares of her later reign we find Ascham recording how "after dinner I went up to read with the queen's majesty that noble oration of Demosthenes against Æschines." At a later time her Latin served her to rebuke the insolence of a Polish ambassador, and she could "rub up her rusty Greek" at need to bandy pedantry with a vice-chancellor. But Elizabeth was far, as yet, from being a mere pedant. She could already speak French and Italian as fluently as her mother-tongue. In later days we find her familiar with Ariosto and Tasso. The purity of her literary taste, the love for a chaste and simple style, which Ascham noted with praise in her girlhood, had not yet perished under the influence of euphuism.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 686.

6099. WOMAN, A spirited. Theste. When Philoxenus, who had married Theste [the sister of Dionysius the tyrant], was declared his enemy, and fled through fear out of Sicily, Dionysius sent for his sister, and reproached her with being privy to her husband's escape, without letting him know it. Theste answered, without fear or hesitation: "Do you think me, Dionysius, so bad a wife, or so weak a woman, that if I had known of my husband's flight I would not have accompanied him, and shared in the worst of his fortunes? Indeed, I was ignorant of it. And I assure you that I should esteem it a higher honor to be called the wife of Philoxenus the exile than the sister of Dionysius the tyrant." The king, it is said, admired her spirited answer; and the Syracusans honored her so much that she retained her princely retinue after the dissolution of the tyranny; and the citizens, by public decree, attended the solemnity of her funeral.—PLUTARCH.

6100. — — —. Mary Stuart Queen of Scots. She brought with her the voluptuous refinement of the French Renaissance; she would lounge for days in bed, and rise only at night for dances and music. But her frame was of iron, and incapable of fatigue; she galloped ninety miles after her last defeat without a pause, save to change horses. She loved risk and adventure and the ring of arms; as she rode in a foray to the north the swordsmen beside her heard her wish she was a man "to know what life it was to lie all night in the fields, or to walk on the cawsey with a jack and knapschalle, a Glasgow buckler, and a broadsword.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 721.

6101. WOMAN, Supremacy of. Veturia. [Caius Marcius, surnamed Coriolanus, was a Roman senator and traitor. He was condemned to exile.] He now proposed to himself a plan of vengeance, in the last degree ignominious, and which no injuries an individual can receive are sufficient to justify. He repaired to the camp of the Volscians, and offered his services to the determined enemies of his country. They were accepted; and such was the consequence of his abilities as a general, that Rome, in the space of a few months, was reduced to extremity. . . . He appeared again with his army under the walls of the city. The Senate maintained an inflexible resistance to the demands of the traitor, and to the popular clamor. At length a band of Roman matrons, at the head of which was Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, with his wife and children, repaired to the camp of the enemy, and suddenly presented themselves at the feet of Coriolanus. The severity of his nature was not proof against this last appeal. He consented to lay down his arms; he ordered his troops to retire; and thus Rome owed her safety to the tears of a woman. [This story is doubted.]—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 4, p. 323.

6102. WOMAN, Taste of. Abraham Lincoln. [He was on his way to Washington to be inaugurated President.] At Northeast station he took occasion [at a welcome gathering] to state that during the campaign he had received a letter from a young girl of the place in which he was kindly admonished . . . to let his whiskers grow; as he had acted upon that piece of advice, he would now be glad to welcome his fair correspondent, if she were among the crowd. In response to the call, a lassie made her way through the crowd, was helped on the platform, and was kissed by the President.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 5, p. 141.

6103. WOMAN, Taught by. Religion. The Goths owed their first knowledge of Christianity to a young girl, a prisoner of war; she continued in the midst of them her exercises of piety; she fasted, prayed, and praised God day and night. When she was asked what good could come of so much painful trouble, she answered: "It is thus that Christ, the Son of God, is to be honored."—NOTE IN GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 16, p. 74.

6104. WOMAN, Tenderness of. Joan of Arc. [At the battle of Patay.] The French men-at-arms did not wait for the English leaders to make up their minds, but, coming up at a gallop, encountered but slight resistance. Talbot [the British commander] would fight, seeking, perhaps, to fall; but he only succeeded in getting made prisoner. The pursuit was murderous; and the bodies of two thousand of the English strewed the plain. At the sight of such numbers of dead La Pucelle shed tears; but she wept much more bitterly when she saw the brutality of the soldiery, and how they treated prisoners who had no ransom to give. Perceiving one of them felled dying to the ground, she was no longer mistress of herself, but threw herself from her horse, raised the poor man's head, sent for a priest, comforted him, and smoothed his way to death.—MICHELET'S JOAN, p. 18.

6105. ——. Lucy Hutchinson. [During the civil war the teachers of religion were cruel and revengeful, but female tenderness and courage were not wanting, as seen in the conduct of Lucy, wife of Colonel Hutchinson, after the attack upon Nottingham Castle.] There was a large room, which was the chapel, in the castle; this they had filled full of prisoners, besides a very bad prison, which was no better than a dungeon, called the "Lion's Den;" the new Captain Palmer and another minister, having nothing else to do, walked up and down the castle yard, insulting and beating the poor prisoners as they were brought up. . . . After our hurt men were dressed, as she stood at her chamber-door, seeing three of the prisoners sorely cut, and carried down bleeding into the Lion's Den, she desired the marshal to bring them in to her, and bound up and dressed their wounds; which while she was doing Captain Palmer came in and told her his soul abhorred to see this favor to the enemies of God; she replied she had done nothing but what she thought was her duty, in humanity to them, as fellow-creatures, and not as enemies.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 4, ch. 2, p. 19.

6106. WOMAN, Transformation of. Constantinople. Constantinople is said to have been originated from the effect of a vision which appeared to the Emperor Constantine while he slept. A venerable matron, sinking under the weight of many years and infirmities, was suddenly transformed into a blooming maid. The monarch awoke, interpreted the auspicious omen, and obeyed without hesitation the will of Heaven, and there established a city.—GIBBON'S ROME, vol. 2, ch. 17, p. 95.

6107. WOMAN, Value of. Exchanged. [Placidia, the] daughter of the great Theodosius, had been the captive and the queen of the Goths; she lost an affectionate husband; she was dragged in chains by his insulting assassin; she tasted the pleasure of revenge, and was exchanged, in the treaty of peace, for six hundred thousand measures of wheat.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 33, p. 363.

6108. WOMAN, Weakness of. Wife of James II. [Tyrconnel wished to be lord-lieutenant of Ireland.] Mary of Modena herself was not free from suspicion of corruption. There was in London a renowned chain of pearls which was valued at ten thousand pounds. It had belonged to Prince Rupert, and by him it had been left to Margaret Hughes, a courtesan, who, toward the close of his life, had exercised a boundless empire over him. [Lord] Tyrconnel loudly boasted that with this chain he had purchased the support of the queen.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 146.

6109. WOMAN, Wickedness of. Fredegonda. Chilperic of Neustria, who had already a concubine named Fredegonda, a woman of remarkable beauty and talent, became a suitor for the hand of Galeswintha, sister to Brunehaut. The marriage took place; but such was the influence of the abandoned Fredegonda, that she persuaded Chilperic to acknowledge her publicly as his mistress, and assign her a residence in the palace. Galeswintha refused to submit to this indignity, and demanded a separation. Chilperic contrived to soothe her by protestations of amendment; but within a few weeks the unhappy queen was found strangled in her bed, and the crime was universally attributed to the instigation of Fredegonda. In defiance of all decency, the king, immediately after his wife's death, married his guilty favorite. . . . In Neustria Fredegonda pursued her career of cruelty, treachery, and bloodshed. She caused Clovis, a son of Chilperic by his first marriage, to be condemned and executed on a charge of sorcery; his young wife was consigned to torture and the stake. Soon afterward Chilperic himself closed his agitated reign by a violent death. He was assassinated at Chelles, near Paris, in 584. . . . The general weight of testimony lays the guilt upon Fredegonda. The king, it is said, had lately discovered her criminal intercourse with one of the officers of the palace; fearing the consequences of his anger, she resolved to secure her own life by sacrificing her husband. . . . This extraordinary woman died in 597, having had reason to congratulate herself on the complete success of her political ambition, if not on the full gratification of her private vengeance. History records few similar examples of atrocious and, at the same time, triumphant wickedness. Writers of all ages concur in holding up the memory of Fredegonda to the execration of posterity.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 4, § 4.

6110. WOMAN, A wise. Artemisia. A woman of a singularly heroic character, Artemisia, queen of Halicarnassus, from a pure spirit of enterprise had joined the fleet of Xerxes with a small squadron, which she commanded in person. The prudence of this woman's counsels, had they been followed, might have saved the Persian monarch the disaster and disgrace that awaited him. She recommended Xerxes to confine his operations to the attack of the enemy by land, to employ his fleet only in the supply of the army, and to avoid all engagement with the Grecian galleys, which now contained the chief force of the enemy. But Xerxes and his officers disdained to follow an advice which they judged the result of female timidity; and the compressed position of the Grecian fleet seemed to offer a favorable opportunity for a decisive blow to their armament. The fleet of the Greeks consisted of 380 ships, that of the Persians amounted to 1200 sail. The latter, with disorderly impetuosity, hastened to the attack; the former waited their assault in perfect order, and with calm and deliberate resolution. A wind sprang up which blew contrary to the fleet of the Persians; and as it thus became necessary to ply their oars with the greater part of their men, their active force was diminished, their motions impeded, and a confusion ensued which gave their enemy a manifest advantage. It was then that the Greeks became the assailants; they raised the psœn, or song of victory, and, aided by the wind, dashed forward upon the Persian squadron, the brazen beaks of the triremes overwhelming and sinking every ship which they touched. The Persians suffered a complete and dreadful defeat. Artemisia, with her galleys, kept the sea, and fought to the last with manly courage; while Xerxes, who had beheld the engagement from an eminence on the shore, no sooner saw its issue, than he precipi-tately fled, upon the circulation of a false report that the Greeks designed to break down his bridge of boats upon the Hellespont. The Greeks, landing from their ships, attacked the rear of the Persian army, and made a dreadful carnage, so that the coast was thickly strewn with the dead bodies.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 1, p. 135.

6111. WOMAN worshipped. Joan of Arc. Chivalry was in every one's mouth as the protection of afflicted dames and damsels. Marshal Boucicaut had just founded an order which had no other object. Besides the worship of the Virgin, constantly extending in the Middle Age, having become the dominant religion, it seemed as if virginity must be an inviolable safeguard. . . . The religion of this epoch was less the adoration of the Virgin than of woman; its chivalry was that portrayed in the Petit Jehan de Saintré—but with the advantage of chastity, in favor of the romance over the truth.—MICHELLET'S JOAN, p. 26.

6112. WOMAN wronged. In Property. [In 1474 Parliament divided the great fortune of the Earl of Warwick—the king-maker. His two brothers received nearly all, leaving his widow but a wretched provision.]—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 11, p. 172.

6113. WOMEN, Zeal of. Rebellion of Monmouth. That an attack was to be made under cover of the night was no secret in Bridgewater. The town was full of women, who had repaired thither by hundreds from the surrounding region, to see their husbands, sons, lovers, and brothers once more. There were many sad partings that day, and many parted never to meet again. The report of the intended attack came to the ears of a young girl who was zealous for the king. Though of modest character, she had the courage to resolve that she would herself bear the intelligence to Feversham [the commander for James II.]. She stole out of Bridgewater, and made her way to the royal camp; but that camp was not a place where female innocence could be safe. Even the officers, despising alike the irregular force to which they were opposed and the negligent general who commanded them, had indulged largely in wine, and were ready for any excess of licentiousness and cruelty. One of them seized the unhappy maiden, refused to listen to her errand, and brutally outraged her. She fled in agonies of rage and shame, leaving the wicked army to its doom.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 561.

6114. ———. In Devonshire. [William of Orange invaded England by invitation.] The acclamations redoubled when, attended by forty running footmen, the prince himself appeared, armed on back and breast, wearing a white plume and mounted on a white charger. With how martial an air he curbed his horse, how thoughtful and commanding was the expression of his ample forehead and falcon eye, may still be seen on the canvas of Kneller. Once his grave features relaxed into a smile. It was when an ancient woman, perhaps one of those zealous Puritans who through twenty-eight years of persecution had waited with firm faith for the consolation of Israel, perhaps the mother of some rebel who had perished in the carnage of Sedgemoor, or in the more fearful carnage of the bloody circuit, broke from the crowd, rushed through the drawn swords and curveting horses, touched the hand of the deliverer, and cried out that now she was happy.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 9, p. 451.

6115. WOMEN, Co-operation of. Revolution, September, 1776. [Washington evacuated New York in great haste. A few hours was of utmost value.] The respite [in the pursuit] which saved [Israel] Putnam's division was due to Mary Lindley, the wife of Robert Murray. When the British army drew near her house on Inceberg, as Murray Hill was then called, Lord Howe and his officers, ordering a halt, accepted her invitation to a lunch; and by the excellence of her viands and old Madeira wine, and by the good-humor with which she parried Tryon's jests at her sympathy with the rebels, she whiled away two hours or more of their time, till every American regiment had escaped.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 9, ch. 6.

6116. WOMEN, Courtesy to. Ancients. [When the Romans and Sabines were reconciled to each other, many] honorable privileges were conferred upon the women, some of which were these: That the men should give them the way, wherever they met them; that they should not mention an obscene word or appear naked before them; that, in case of their killing any person, they should not be tried before the ordinary judges; and that their children should wear an ornament about their necks, called Bulla, from its likeness to a bubble, and a garment bordered with purple.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS.

6117. WOMEN, Culture of. Unappreciated. [Swift wrote a paper on] "The Education of Ladies" [early in the eighteenth century], in which he says: "There is a subject of controversy which I have frequently met with in mixed and select companies of both sexes, and sometimes only of men—whether it be prudent to choose a wife who has good natural sense, some taste of wit and humor, able to read and relish history, books of travels, moral or entertaining discourses, and be a tolerable judge of the beauties in poetry? This question is generally determined in the negative by women themselves, and almost universally by we men."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 27, p. 421.

6118. WOMEN degraded. Roman Law. Women were condemned to the perpetual tutelage of parents, husbands, or guardians; a sex created to please and obey was never supposed to have attained the age of reason and experience. Such, at least, was the stern and haughty spirit of the ancient law, which had been insensibly mollified before the time of Justinian.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 44, p. 355.

6119. WOMEN, Devotion of. Piety. [That Camillus, the Roman general, might perform his vow to Apollo, the Senate and citizens were called upon to assist him. They] all produced their proportion, and it was resolved that a vase of massy gold should be made and sent to Delphi. But as there was a scarcity of gold in the city, while the magistrates were considering how to procure it, the Roman-matrons met, and having consulted among themselves, gave up their golden ornaments, which weighed eight talents, as an offering to the god. And the Senate, in honor of their piety, decreed that they should have funeral orations as well as the men, which had not been the custom before.—PLUTARCH'S CAMILLUS.

6120. WOMEN, Ferocious. Barbarians. [When the Romans defeated the Ambrones, they fled through their camp, where] the women meeting them with swords and axes, and setting up a horrid and hideous cry, fell upon the fugitives as well as the pursuers, the former as traitors, and the latter as enemies. Mingling with the combatants, they laid hold on the Roman shields, caught at their swords with their naked hands, and obstinately suffered themselves to be hacked in pieces.—PLUTARCH'S CAIUS MARIUS.

6121. WOMEN in Government. Revolutions. It is somewhat extraordinary that most of the revolutions of the Roman State should have owed their origin to women. To a woman Rome owed the abolition of the regal dignity and the establishment of the republic. To a woman she owed her delivery from the tyranny of the decemviri, and the restoration of the consular government; and to a woman she owed that change of the constitution by which the plebeians became capable of holding the highest offices of the commonwealth. [See No. 5716.]-TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 6, p. 348.

6122. WOMEN and Government. Injuries. Arbitrary power spoils the shape of the foot in China; hurries the Indian woman to her husband's funeral pile; makes the daughters of Eve in Persia mere chattels; gives a woman the twelfth share of a husband in the dominions of the Grand Turk; and renders them slaves of duennas and governesses in Spain and Italy.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 27, p. 418.

6123. WOMEN, Hard-hearted. Reign of James II. [The property of the defeated rebels, under the Duke of Monmouth, was confiscated, and extortion applied to all who could be suspected of sympathy; their families were left destitute, while the unfortunate men were sold into slavery.] The ladies of the queen's household distinguished themselves pre-eminently by rapacity and hard-heartedness. Part of the disgrace which they incurred falls on [Mary] their mistress, for it was solely on account of the relation in which they stood to her that they were able to enrich themselves by so odious a trade; and there can be no question that she might, with a word or a look, have restrained them; but, in truth, she encouraged them by her evil example, if not by her express approbation.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 5, p. 605.

6124. WOMEN, Heroic. For Reform. [In 1642, when the despotism of Charles I. was being broken,] women took part in this great question of the time with an ardor in which there is nothing really ridiculous. The cavaliers laughed at "the zealous sisterhood;" but in a juster point of view there is something as heroic as the royalist Countess of Derby's defence of Latham House in the demeanor of the Puritan Ann Stugg, a brewer's wife, when she went to the door of the House of Commons, at the head of a great number of women of the middle class, and presented a petition, which said: "It may be thought strange and unbecoming our sex to show ourselves here, bearing a petition to this honorable assembly; but Christ purchased us at as dear a rate as He did men, and therefore requireth the same obedience, for the same mercy, as of men; we are sharers in the public calamities." Pym, the speaker, replied: "Repair to your houses, we entreat, and turn your petitions into prayers at home for us."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 30, p. 489.

6125. ———. Flora MacDonald. [After the battle of Culloden, in 1746, Charles Edward, the grandson of James II., who there lost all hope of gaining the British crown, wandered among the Highlands, seeking an escape to France. Thirty thousand pounds had been offered for his apprehension, and the country was full of those who were eager to find him.] He wandered alone among the hills, till he was enabled to escape to Skye. This he effected through the compassionate courage and sagacity of Flora MacDonald. Charles was dressed as a female, when, with Flora and a faithful Highlander, he went to sea in an open boat. They landed at last in the country of Sir Alexander MacDonald, who was opposed to the Jacobite cause. Flora boldly appealed to the sympathy of the Jacobite chief, Lady Margaret MacDonald, and through her aid Charles was enabled to escape from the danger which he might have encountered in this hostile district.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 6, ch. 9, p. 175.

6126. WOMEN honored. Ancient Germans. [The German Barbarians] treated their women with esteem and confidence, consulted them on every occasion of importance, and fondly believed that in their breasts resided a sanctity and wisdom more than human. Some of the interpreters of fate, such as Velleda, in the Batavian war, governed, in the name of the Deity, the fiercest nations of Germany. The rest of the sex, without being adored as goddesses, were respected as the free and equal companions of soldiers, associated even by the marriage ceremony to a life of toil, of danger, and of glory. In their great invasions the camps of the Barbarians were filled with a multitude of women, who remained firm and undaunted amid the sound of arms, the various forms of destruction, and the honorable wounds of their sons and husbands.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 268.

6127. WOMEN, Injustice to. By Nobility. The statute of thirty-first Henry VI. shows how "unsatiable covetousness" had moved "divers people of great power against all right, gentleness, truth, and good conscience." Their offence was the "great abusing of ladies, gentlewomen, and other women sole, having any substance of lands, tenements, or movable goods." To such they come "promising faithful friendship;" and perceiving their great innocence and simplicity, "carried them off by force, or inveigled them to places where they were of power, and compelled them to sign obligations for money for their liberty. Also . . . they will many times compel them to be married to them, contrary to their likings."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 2, ch. 8, p. 113.

6128. WOMEN, Insults from. Towards. [When the Goths surrendered Ravenna to the Romans, after a protracted siege,] multitudes of tall and robust Barbarians were confounded by the masculine females, spitting in the faces of their sons and husbands, most bitterly reproached them for betraying their dominion and freedom to these pigmies of the south, contemptible in their numbers, diminutive in their stature.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 41, p. 181.

6129. WOMEN, Patriotic. Boston, 1770. The determination to keep clear of paying the Parliament's taxes spread into every social circle. One week three hundred wives of Boston, the next a hundred and ten more, with one hundred and twenty-six of the young and unmarried of their sex, renounced the use of tea till the revenue acts should be repealed. How could the troops interfere?—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 6, ch. 43.

6130. WOMEN in Politics. Cicero's Wife. Terentia was by no means of a meek and timid disposition, but had her ambition, and (as Cicero himself says) took a greater share with him in politics than she permitted him to have in domestic business.—PLUTARCH'S CICERO.

6131. WOMEN, Power of. "Soap." [In London great ado was made about soap when Charles I. sold the monopoly of its manufacture. Women complained that the new soap burned the linen, scalded the laundresses' fingers, and wasted in keeping. The king commands the Lord Mayor of London to be reprimanded for] his pusillanimity in this business, being afraid of a troop of women that clamorously petitioned him against the new soap.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 26, p. 416.

6132. WOMEN, Preaching by. Methodism. [Mr. Wesley permitted Miss Mary Bosanquet, Miss Crosby, and Miss Tripp to exhort in rustic assemblies. His mother had held similar meetings at the Epworth Rectory, and had thereby filled the parish church.] Also in later years Mary Fletcher had a seat elevated a step or two above the level of the floor, whence she addressed the people in the several chapels which she and her husband erected in the vicinity of Madeley.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 2, p. 268.

6133. WOMEN, Reform by. Church. [In 1637, when Charles I. attempted by his ministers to force the liturgy upon the Scots, they experienced great trouble from the women. In Glasgow, when the Bishop of Argyle began to officiate in the use of the ritual,] the servant-maids began such a tumult as was never heard since the Reformation in our nation [says a witness of the scene]. Jane or Janet Geddes flung a little folding-stool whereon she sat at the dean's head, saying, "Out, thou false thief! dost thou say the mass at my lug?" . . . At Edinburgh preachers who defend the liturgy are maltreated, and mostly "by enraged women of all qualities." . . . From the date of this violent defiance of the principles and habits of the Scottish people, the reign of Charles becomes the turning-point in English history.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 17, p. 480.

6134. WOMEN, Rights of. Mahometan. Mahomet said: . . . "O men! you have rights over your wives, and they have equally rights over you. . . . Remember that they are in your houses like captives submitted to a master, and who have nothing reserved to themselves. They have delivered you their body and their soul on the faith of God. They are a sacred deposit that God has intrusted to you."—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 145.

6135. ——. Mrs. Anne Hutchinson. Most prominent among those who were said to be "as bad as Roger Williams, or worse," was Mrs. Anne Hutchinson, a woman of genius who had come over in the ship with Sir Henry Vane. She desired the privilege of speaking at the weekly debates, and was refused. Women had no business at these assemblies, said the elders. Indignant at this, she became the champion of her sex, and declared that the ministers who were defrauding women of the gospel were no better than Pharisees. She called meetings of her friends, spoke much in public, and pleaded with great fervor for the full freedom of conscience. The liberal doctrines of the exiled Williams were reaffirmed with more power and eloquence than ever. Many of the magistrates were converted to the new belief; the governor himself espoused the cause of Mrs. Hutchinson, and a majority of the people at Boston inclined to her opinions. For a while there was a reign of discord; but as soon as Sir Henry's term of office expired a call was issued for a meeting of the synod of New England. The body convened in August of 1637; a decree was proposed; Mrs. Hutchinson and her friends were declared unfit for the society of Christians, and banished from the territory of Massachusetts. With a large number of friends the exiles wended their way to the house of Roger Williams. Miantonomoh, a Narragansett chieftain, made them a gift of the beautiful island of Rhode Island. There, in the month of March, 1641, a little republic was established, in whose constitution freedom of conscience was guaranteed and persecution for opinion's sake forbidden.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 13, p. 131.

6136. WOMEN, Rivalry of. Cleopatra. [Antony's wife] Octavia . . . had quitted Rome to join him, and was already arrived at Athens. Cleopatra rightly perceived that she came only to dispute Antony's heart with her. She was afraid that with her virtue, wisdom, and gravity of manners, if she had time to make use of her modest, but lively and insinuating attractions, to win her husband, that she would gain an absolute power over him. To avoid which danger, she affected to be dying for love of Antony, and with that view made herself lean and wan, by taking very little nourishment. Whenever he entered her apartment she looked upon him with an air of surprise and amazement, and when he left her seemed to languish with sorrow and dejection. She often contrived to appear bathed in tears, and at the same moment endeavored to cry and conceal them, as if to hide from him her weakness and disorder. Antony, who feared nothing so much as occasioning the least uneasiness to Cleopatra, wrote letters to Octavia to order her to stay for him at Athens, and to come no farther, because he was upon the point of undertaking some new expedition. . . . That virtuous Roman lady, dissembling the wrong he did her, sent to him to know where it would be agreeable to him to have the presents carried which she had designed for him, since he did not think fit to let her deliver them in person. Antony received this second compliment no better than the first; and Cleopatra, who had prevented his seeing Octavia, would not permit him to receive anything from her.

Octavia was obliged therefore to return to Rome without having produced any other effect by her voyage than that of making Antony more inexcusable.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 24, § 2.

6137. WOMEN, Ruined by. Spartans. Amid all that rigid austerity of manners which the laws of Lycurgus seem calculated to enforce, how astonishing is it that public decency and decorum should have been totally overlooked! The Spartan women were the reproach of Greece for their immodesty; and Aristotle imputes chiefly to their licentiousness and intemperance those disorders which were ultimately the ruin of the State. The men and women frequented promiscuously the public baths; the youth of both sexes ran, wrestled, and fought naked in the palaestra. . . . The laws of Lycurgus permitted one citizen to borrow another's wife, for the purpose of a good breed, and held it no dishonor for an aged man who had a handsome wife to offer her to a young man, and to educate as his own the issue of that connection. The chief end of marriage, according to the lawgiver's notions, was to furnish the State with a vigorous and healthy race of citizens.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 9, p. 94.

6138. WOMEN rule Men. Cato. Cato the Censor, speaking of the power of women, said: "All men naturally govern the women, we govern all men, and our wives govern us."—PLUTARCH'S CATO.

6139. WOMEN, Testimony of. First in Court. When Tarquinia, a vestal, gave another adjacent field to the public, she was honored with great privileges, particularly that of giving her testimony in court, which was refused to all other women; they likewise voted her liberty to marry, but she did not accept it.—PLUTARCH.

6140. WOMEN, Warriors of. Dahomey. In Abomey, the capital of the kingdom of Dahomey, there are within the palace barracks five thousand Amazons of the king's army which live in celibacy under the care of eunuchs.—APPLETON'S CYCLOPEDIA, "ABOMEY."

6141. ——. Arabian. [In the bloody battle between the Christians and Mahometans near the Lake Tiberias, in the army of the Mussulmans, the last] line was occupied by the sister of Derar, with the Arabian women who had enlisted in this holy war, who were accustomed to wield the bow and the lance, and who in a moment of captivity had defended, against the uncircumcised ravishers, their chastity and religion. The exhortation of the generals was brief and forcible: "Paradise is before you, the devil and hell-fire in your rear." Yet such was the weight of the Roman cavalry, that the right wing of the Arabs was broken and separated from the main body. Thrice did they retreat in disorder, and thrice were they driven back to the charge by the reproaches and blows of the women.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 51, p. 208.

6142. WOMEN, Warriors of. Second Crusade. [The second crusade was led by the sovereigns Conrad III. and Louis VII.] Under the banners of Conrad a troop of females rode in the attitude and armor of men; and the chief of these Amazons, from her gilt spurs and buskins, obtained the epithet of the Golden-footed Dame.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 59, p. 6.

6143. WONDER, Superstitious. San Salvador. [The natives,] when they had still further recovered from their fears, approached the Spaniards, touched their beards, and examined their hands and faces, admiring their whiteness. Columbus was pleased with their gentleness and confiding simplicity, and suffered their scrutiny with perfect acquiescence, winning them by his benignity. They now supposed that the ships had sailed out of the crystal firmament which bounded their horizon, or had descended from above on their ample wings, and that these marvellous beings were inhabitants of the skies.—IRVING'S COLUMBUS, Book 4, ch. 1.

6144. WORDS, Backing for. Lysander. When a citizen of Megara treated Lysander with great freedom, in a certain conversation, he said, "My friend, those words of thine should not come but from strong walls and bulwarks."—PLUTARCH'S LYSANDER.

6145. WORDS, Hasty. Henry II. [Archbishop Thomas] Becket gloried in his heart at this triumph which served only to increase his ambition, insolence, and presumption. The condescension of Henry convinced him of his own superiority and of his sovereign's weakness. He began to make triumphal processions through the kingdom, and to exercise his spiritual and judicial powers with the most arbitrary increase of authority. The Archbishop of York, who, in his absence, crowned the king's eldest son, was suspended from his function, as were several other prelates who had officiated at the solemnity. Deposition and excommunication were daily occurrences, and Henry, who was then in Normandy, heard with surprise and indignation that his whole kingdom was in a flame from the turbulent and tyrannical conduct of the primate. A few hasty words which he uttered upon the first intelligence of these disorders were interpreted by some of his servants into a mandate. Four of them immediately embarked for England, where they arrived next day, and finding Becket in the act of celebrating vespers in the cathedral church of Canterbury, they beat out his brains before the altar. Thus the man who ought to have fallen by public justice as a traitor was, from the mode of his death, considered as a saint and martyr. The murder of Becket gave the king unfeigned concern; he saw that his death would produce those very effects with regard to the church which he most wished to prevent; and that the bulk of his subjects, blinded by the influence of their priests and confessors, would consider him as his murderer. He made the most ample submissions to the pope, who pardoned him on assurance of sincere repentance.—MACAULAY'S ENG., Book 6, ch. 8, p. 140.

6146. WORDS, Origin of. "Sandwich." The reputation of Lord Sandwich has survived as one of the most profligate in his private life, and one of the meanest in his public career. His club-gambling has given a name to "a bit of beef between two slices of bread," the only food he took for four-and-twenty hours without ever quitting his game.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 7, ch. 6, p. 104.

6147. WORDS, Thrilling. At the Stake. No monument is necessary to commemorate an event which will be remembered, through the power of a few thrilling words, as long as the English language shall endure. Stripped of his prison dress, the aged Latimer—the bent old man—“stood bolt upright, as comely a father as one might lightly behold.” He stands bolt upright in his shroud. Ridley and he “stand coupled for a common flight,” and he says, “Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man! We shall this day light such a candle, by God’s grace, in England, as shall never be put out.”—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 6, p. 91.

6148. WORK, Change in. Southey. It was part of Southey’s regimen to carry on several works at once; this he found to be economy of time, and he believed it necessary for the preservation of his health. Whenever one object entirely occupied his attention, it haunted him, oppressed him, troubled his dreams. The remedy was simple—to do one thing in the morning, another in the evening. To lay down poetry and presently to attack history seems feasible, and no ill policy for one who is forced to take all he can out of himself.—DOWDEN’S SOUTHEY, ch. 5.

6149. WORK, Dignity in. Royalty. We read in Homer of princesses themselves drawing water from springs, and washing, with their own hands, the linen of their respective families. Here the sisters of Alexander—that is, the daughters of a powerful prince, are employed in making clothes for their brother. The celebrated Lucretia used to spin in the midst of her female attendants. Augustus, who was sovereign of the world, wore, for several years together, no other clothes but what his wife and sister made him. It was a custom in the northern parts of the world, not many years since, for the princes who then sat upon the throne to prepare several of the dishes at every meal. In a word, needle-work, the care of domestic affairs, a serious and retired life, is the proper function of women, and for this they were designed by Providence.—ROLLIN’S HIST., Book 15, § 9.

6150. WORK, End of. Bæda, the English Monk. The noblest proof of his love of England lies in the work which immortalizes his name. In his “Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation,” Bæda was at once the founder of mediæval history and the first English historian. . . . Bæda longed to bring to an end his version of St. John’s Gospel into the English tongue and his extracts from Bishop Isidore. “I don’t want my boys to read a lie,” he answered those who would have had him rest, “or to work to no purpose after I am gone.” A few days before Ascension-tide his sickness grew upon him, but he spent the whole day in teaching, only saying cheerfully to his scholars, “Learn with what speed you may; I know not how long I may last.” The dawn broke on another sleepless night, and again the old man called his scholars round him and bade them write. “There is still a chapter wanting,” said the scribe, as the morning drew on, “and it is hard for thee to question thyself any longer.” “It is easily done,” said Bæda; “take thy pen and write quickly.” Amid tears and farewells the day wore on to eventide. “There is yet one sentence unwritten, dear master,” said the boy. “Write it quickly,” bade the dying man. “It is finished now,” said the little scribe at last. “You speak truth,” said the master, “all is finished now.” Placed upon the pavement, his head supported in his scholar’s arms, his face turned to the spot where he was wont to pray, Bæda chanted the solemn “Glory to God.” As his voice reached the close of his song he passed quietly away.—HIST. OF ENG. PEOPLE, § 61.

6151. WORK, Life. Columbus. It is a curious and characteristic fact . . . that the recovery of the holy sepulchre was one of the great objects of his ambition, meditated throughout the remainder of his life, and solemnly provided for in his will. In fact, he subsequently considered it the main work for which he was chosen by Heaven as an agent, and that his great discovery was but a preparatory dispensation of Providence to furnish means for its accomplishment.—IRVING’S COLUMBUS, Book 2, ch. 6.

6152. WORK, Silent. Stephen A. Douglas. If any man could get a bill through Congress, he could. He did not care much to shine as a speaker, and, indeed, he did not excel as a speaker in Congress. What he prided himself upon was his skill and success in getting a troublesome measure passed, and in effecting this, he was quite willing that others should have all the glory of openly advocating it. He has been known to spend two years in engineering a bill, devoting most of his time to it, and yet never once speaking upon it. This was the case with the long series of measures which resulted in the Illinois Central Railroad.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 200.

6153. WORKERS wanted. Colonists. [The London Company, which colonized Virginia,] thought that the unskilled and idle, who would starve at home, might prosper in another hemisphere. [John] Smith wrote to the corporation that when they sent again, they should rather send but thirty carpenters, husbandmen, gardeners, fishermen, blacksmiths, masons, and even diggers up of the roots of trees, than a thousand such as had last come out.—KNIGHT’S ENG., vol. 3, ch. 22, p. 345.

6154. WORK, Worth by. Oxen. They share with man in the labors of husbandry, and spare him the greatest part of the toil. Hence it was that the ox, the laborious companion of man in tilling the ground, was so highly regarded by the ancients, that whoever had killed one of them was punished with death, as if he had killed a citizen; no doubt, because he was esteemed a kind of murderer of the human race, whose nourishment of life stood in absolute need of the aid of this animal.—ROLLIN’S HIST., Book 24, art. 4.

6155. WORKS, Good. Zoroaster. [By the teaching of Zoroaster the] saint, in the Magian religion, is obliged to beget children, to plant useful trees, to destroy noxious animals, to convey water to the dry lands of Persia, and to work out his salvation by pursuing all the labors of agriculture. We may quote from the Zend-avesta a wise and benevolent maxim, which compensates for many an absurdity. “He who sows the ground with care and diligence acquires a greater stock of religious merit than he could gain by the repetition of ten thousand prayers."—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 8, p. 235.

6156. WORKS, Justification by. Luther. No matter how much he studied and prayed, no matter how severely he castigated himself with fasting and watching, he found no peace to his soul. Even when he imagined that he had satisfied the law, he often despaired of getting rid of his sins and of securing the grace of God.—REIN'S LUTHER, ch. 3, p. 33.

6157. WORLD, Origin of the. Thales. The metaphysical opinions of Thales are but imperfectly known. He supposed the world to be framed by the Deity out of the original element of water, and animated by His essence as the body is by the soul; that the Deity therefore resided in every portion of space; and that this world was only a great temple, where the sight of everything around him reminded man of that Great Being which inhabited and pervaded it.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 261.

6158. WORLDLINESS rebuked. Socrates. [At his trial he made a noble defence.] Should you resolve to acquit me, on condition that I keep silence for the future, I should not hesitate to make answer, "Athenians, I honor and love you, but I shall choose rather to obey God than you, and to my latest breath shall never renounce philosophy, nor cease to exhort and reprove you according to my custom, by telling each of you when you come in my way, My good friend, and citizen of the most famous city in the world for wisdom and valor, are you not ashamed of having no other thoughts than that of amassing wealth and of acquiring glory, credit, and dignities, while you neglect the treasures of prudence, truth, and wisdom, and take no pains in rendering your soul as good and perfect as it is capable of being?"—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 9, ch. 4, § 6.

6159. WORSHIP, Apostates from. Samaritans. [Nearly two hundred years before Christ Antiochus Epiphanes bitterly persecuted the Jews at Jerusalem. (See No. 6166.) The Samaritans] presented a petition to the king, in which they declared themselves not to be Jews, and desired that their temple, built on Mount Gerizim, which till then had not been dedicated to any deity in particular, might henceforward be dedicated to the Grecian Jupiter, and be called after his name. Antiochus received their petition very graciously, and ordered Nicanor, deputy-governor of the province of Samaria, to dedicate their temple to the Grecian Jupiter as they had desired, and not to molest them in any manner.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 19, ch. 2, § 3.

6160. WORSHIP, Cheerful. In Adversity. [When Hannibal had slaughtered the Roman army and endangered the capital, the grief was universal.] Fabius Maximus fixed both the place and time for mourning, allowed thirty days for that purpose in a man's own house, and no more for the city in general. And as the feast of Ceres fell within that time, it was thought better entirely to omit the solemnity, than by the small numbers and the melancholy looks of those that should attend it, to discover the greatness of their loss; for the worship most acceptable to the gods is that which comes from cheerful hearts.—PLUTARCH'S FABIUS MAXIMUS.

6161. WORSHIP, Constrained. Heathen. It appears that Numa's religious institutions in general are very wise, and that this in particular is highly conducive to the purposes of piety—namely, that when the magistrates or priests are employed in any sacred ceremony, a herald goes before, and proclaims aloud, "Hoc age"—i.e., "be attentive to this;" thereby commanding everybody to regard the solemn acts of religion, and not to suffer any business or avocation to intervene and disturb them; as well knowing that men's attention, especially in what concerns the worship of the gods, is seldom fixed, but by a sort of violence and constraint.—PLUTARCH'S CAIUS MARIUS.

6162. WORSHIP, Dreadful. Druids. "There is," says he [Lucian], "without the walls of Marseilles a sacred grove, which had never been touched by axe since the creation. The trees of it grew so thick, and were so interwoven, that they suffered not the rays of the sun to pierce through their branches; but a dreary damp and perfect darkness reigned through the place. Neither nymphs nor sylvan gods could inhabit this recess, it being destined for the most inhuman mysteries. There was nothing to be seen there but a multitude of altars, upon which they sacrificed human victims, whose blood dyed the trees with horrid crimson. If ancient tradition may be credited, no bird ever perched upon their boughs, no beast ever trod under them, no wind ever blew through them, nor thunderbolt did ever touch them. These tall oaks, as well as the black water that winds in different channels through the place, fill the mind with dread and horror. The figures of the god of the grove are a kind of rude and shapeless trunks, covered over with a dismal yellow moss. 'It is the genius of the Gauls,' continues he, "thus to reverence gods of whom they know not the figure; and their ignorance of the object of their worship increases their veneration. There is a report that this grove is often shaken and strangely agitated, and that dreadful sounds are heard from its deep recesses; that the trees, if destroyed or thrown down, arise again of themselves; that the forest is sometimes seen to be on fire, without being consumed, and that the oaks are twined about with monstrous serpents. The Gauls dare not live in it, from the awe of the divinity that inhabits it, and to whom they entirely abandon it. Only at noon and at midnight a priest goes trembling into it, to celebrate its dreadful mysteries; and is in continual fear lest the deity to whom it is consecrated should appear to him."—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 5, ch. 6, p. 34.

6163. WORSHIP enforced. New England Puritans. The magistrates insisted on the presence of every man at public worship; [Roger] Williams reprobated the law; the worst statute in the English code was that which did but enforce attendance upon the parish church. . . . "An unbelieving soul is dead in sin," such was his argument; and to force the indifferent from one worship to another, "was like shifting a dead man into several changes of apparel."—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 1, ch. 9.

6164. WORSHIP, Idolatrous. Ancient Germans. They adored the great visible objects and agents of nature, the sun and the moon, the fire and the earth, together with those imaginary deities who were supposed to preside over the most important occupations of human life. They were persuaded that, by some ridiculous arts of divination, they could discover the will of the superior beings, and that human sacrifices were the most precious and acceptable offering to their altars.—GIBBON'S ROME, ch. 9, p. 269.

6165. WORSHIP of Images. Ancient Christian. One great article of dissension was the worship of images, which had been gradually gaining ground for some centuries. It arose first from the custom of having crucifixes in private houses, and portraits of our Saviour and His apostles, which sometimes being of considerable value, were, among other religious donations, bequeathed by dying persons to the church, where they were displayed on solemn festivals. The clergy at first took pains to repress that superstition. In the year 393 we find St. Epiphanius pulled down an image in a church of Syria, before which he found an ignorant person saying prayers. Others, however, of his brethren were not so circumspect or scrupulous, and in time the priests even found their interest in encouraging the practice; for particular images in particular churches, acquiring a higher degree of celebrity than others, and getting the reputation of performing miraculous cures, the grateful donations that were made to the church were a very considerable emolument to the ecclesiastics.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 3, p. 82.

6166. WORSHIP, Perilous. Jerusalem. Antiochus, at his return from Egypt, exasperated to see forcibly torn from him by the Romans a crown which he looked upon already as his own, made the Jews, though they had not offended him in any manner, feel the whole weight of his wrath. . . . Apollonius [his officer] arrived there [at Jerusalem] just two years after this city had been taken by Antiochus. At his first coming he did not behave in any manner as if he had received such cruel orders, and waited till the first Sabbath-day before he executed them. But then, seeing all the people assembled peaceably in the synagogues, and engaged in paying their religious worship to the Creator, he put in execution the barbarous commission he had received, and setting all his troops upon them, he commanded them to cut to pieces all the men, and to seize all the women and children, in order that they might be exposed to sale. These commands were obeyed with the utmost cruelty and rigor. Not a single man was spared, all they could find being cruelly butchered, insomuch that the streets streamed with blood. The city was afterward plundered, and fire set to several parts of it, after all the riches that could be found had been carried off. [See No. 6159.]—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 19, ch. 2, § 3.

6167. WORSHIP, Retreat from. Jefferson Davis. The church bells [of Richmond] called, as usual, the inhabitants to the house of worship, and Davis, among the rest, and all was peaceful and quiet. . . . In the midst of the service a messenger approached the pew in which the Confederate President sat and handed him a slip of paper. It was from the War Department, containing a despatch from Lee, to have everything ready for the evacuation of Richmond by eight o'clock at night. Had a thunderbolt fallen from a cloudless sky he could not have been more appalled. Crushing back the emotions of his heart, he rose and left the church.—HEADLEY'S GRANT, p. 223.

6168. WORSHIP of Science. Timour. [Timour the Tartar] went to pray indifferently on the tombs of the Christian saints and on those of the noted dervishes. His worship of science and virtue was impartial; was it philosophy, was it policy? Nothing in history explains this mystery in the life of the conqueror.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 314.

6169. WORSHIP, Substitute for. To Samuel Johnson. Dr. John Campbell, the celebrated political and biographical writer, being mentioned, Johnson said: . . . "Campbell is a good man, a pious man. I am afraid he has not been in the inside of a church for many years; but he never passes a church without pulling off his hat. This shows that he has good principles."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 115.

6170. WORTH, Moral. Louis IX. Louis IX. stands forth in history an ever-memorable instance of the inherent power of high moral and religious principle, when faithfully and consistently carried out through a whole life. . . . Voltaire, no partial panegyrist in such a case, has said of him that "it is not given to man to carry virtue to a higher point." Louis was canonized on the 11th of August, 1297, by Pope Boniface VIII.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 9, § 6.

6171. WOUNDS, Honorable. Timour. [Timour the Tartar bore the] name of Timour Lenk, or Timour the Lame. This surname, which alluded both to his infirmity and precocious glory, was given him in consequence of a wound on the leg received in fighting for his country. He paraded it as a title of honor, and added it himself to his name.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 304.

6172. ———. Soldier. [Sertorius was a soldier from his youth.] Nor did his martial intrepidity abate when he arrived at the degree of general. His personal exploits were still great, and he faced danger in the most fearless manner; in consequence of which he had one of his eyes struck out. This, however, he always gloried in. He said others did not always carry about with them the honorable badges of their valor, but sometimes laid aside their chains, their truncheons, and coronets, while he had perpetually the evidences of his bravery about him, and those who saw his misfortune at the same time beheld his courage. The people, too, treated him with the highest respect.—PLUTARCH'S SERTORIUS.

6173. ———. In the Front. "Young Siward" perished in the battle-field where Macbeth fell. "Where were his wounds?" said the stout old earl [his father]. "In front." "Then I could wish no better fate."—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 1, ch. 12, p. 163.

6174. WRITING, Substitute for. Cords. An invention . . . approaching still nearer to writing was the Peruvian quipos, or cords of various colors, with certain knots upon them of different size, and differently combined. With these they contrived to accomplish most of the purposes of writing; they formed registers which contained the annals of their empire, the state of the public revenues, the account of their taxes for the support of government, and by means of them they recorded their astronomical observation.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 1, ch. 3, p. 25.

6175. WRONGS redressed, Imaginary. War. Alexander arrived at a little city inhabited by the Branchidæ. These were the descendants of a family who had dwelt in Miletus, whom Xerxes, at his return from Greece, had formerly sent into Upper Asia, where he had settled them in a very flourishing condition, in return for their having delivered up to him the treasure of the temple of Apollo Didymæus, the keepers of which they were. They received the king with the highest demonstration of joy, and surrendered both themselves and their city to him. Alexander sent for such Milesians as were in his army who preserved an hereditary hatred against the Branchidæ, because of the treachery of their ancestors. He then left them the choice either of revenging the injury they had formerly done them, or of pardoning them in consideration of their common extraction. The Milesians being so much divided in opinion that they could not agree among themselves, Alexander undertook the decision himself. Accordingly, the next day, he commanded his phalanx to surround the city; and a signal being given, they were ordered to plunder that abode of traitors, and put every one of them to the sword, which inhuman order was executed with the same barbarity as it had been given. All the citizens, at the very time that they were going to pay homage to Alexander, were murdered in the streets and in their houses, no manner of regard being paid to their cries and tears, nor the least distinction made of age or sex. . . . But of what crimes were those ill-fated citizens guilty? Were they responsible for those their fathers had committed upward of one hundred and fifty years before? I do not know whether history furnishes another example of so brutal and frantic a cruelty.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 15, § 12.

6176. YEAR lengthened, The. Julius Cæsar. The Alexandrian observers had discovered that the annual course of the sun was completed in three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours. The lunar twelve was allowed to remain to fix the number of the months. The number of days in each month were adjusted to absorb three hundred and sixty-five days. The superfluous hours were allowed to accumulate, and every fourth year an additional day was to be intercalated. An arbitrary step was required to repair the negligence of the past. Sixty-five days had still to be made good. The new system, depending wholly on the sun, would naturally have commenced with the winter solstice. But Cæsar so far deferred to usage as to choose to begin, not with the solstice itself, but with the first new moon which followed. It so happened in that year that the new moon was eighty days after the solstice; and thus the next year started, as it continues to start, from the 1st of January. The eight days were added to the sixty-five, and the current year was lengthened by nearly three months.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 25, p. 62.

6177. YEAR, The new. Samuel Johnson. How seriously Johnson was impressed with a sense of religion, even in the vigor of his youth, appears from the following passage in his minutes, kept by way of diary: "September 7, 1736.—I have this day entered upon my twenty-eighth year. Mayest thou, O God, enable me, for Jesus Christ's sake, to spend this in such a manner that I may receive comfort from it at the hour of death, and in the day of judgment! Amen."—BOSWELL'S JOHNSON, p. 13.

6178. YOUNG MAN, Unpromising. "Pale." [One of the sayings of Cato was,] that he liked a young man that blushed more than one that turned pale; and that he did not like a soldier who moved his hands in marching, and his feet in fighting, and who snored louder in bed than he shouted in battle.—PLUTARCH'S CATO THE CENSOR.

6179. YOUNG MEN, Conquest by. Colonies. Dionysius of Halicarnassus informs us of the manner in which a State, when it became overstocked, transplanted its colonies. They consecrated to a particular god all the youth of a certain age, furnished them with arms, and after the performance of a solemn sacrifice, dismissed them to conquer for themselves a new country. These enterprises were, no doubt, often unsuccessful; but when they succeeded, and an establishment was obtained, it does not appear that the mother State pretended to have any rights over them, or claims upon the country where they settled.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 3, ch. 1, p. 285.

6180. YOUNG MEN, Deeds of. Bonaparte. Napoleon Bonaparte, who had not yet completed his twenty-seventh year, was appointed general-in-chief of the army of Italy.—STUDENTS' FRANCE, ch. 27, § 13.

6181. YOUNG MEN, Energetic. Brutus. Brutus had so much influence with Cæsar that he reconciled him to his friend Cassius; and when he spoke in behalf of the King of Africa, though there were many impeachments against him, he obtained for him a great part of his kingdom. When he first began to speak on this occasion, Cæsar said: "I know not what this young man intends, but whatever it is, he intends it strongly."—PLUTARCH'S BRUTUS.

6182. YOUNG MEN, Patriotism of. Rebellion. [When General Grant visited Hamburg he attended a banquet in his honor, and was spoken of as having saved his country.] Grant replied: "... I must dissent upon one remark, . . . that I saved the country during the recent war. If our country could be saved or ruined by any one man, we should not have a country, and we should not now be celebrating our Fourth of July. . . . If I had never held command—if I had fallen—if all our generals had fallen, there were ten thousand behind us who would have done our work just as well. . . . What saved the Union was the coming forward of the young men. . . . So long as our young men are animated by this spirit there will be no fear for the Union."—GENERAL GRANT'S TRAVELS, p. 232.

6183. — — — Resisting the Stamp Act. [Patrick Henry presented resolutions to the Virginia legislature sustaining the independence of colonies, which were carried by small majorities

—the fifth by one vote.] But Henry “carried all the young members with him.” [And so] Virginia gave the signal for the continent.—BANCROFT’S U. S., vol. 5, ch. 13.

6184. YOUNG MEN, Success of. *Timour the Tartar. From the twelfth year of his age Timour had entered the field of action; in the twenty-fifth he stood forth as the deliverer of his country; and the eyes and wishes of the people were turned toward a hero who suffered in their cause. . . . At the age of thirty-four, and in a general diet, or couroultai, he was invested with imperial command; but he affected to revere the house of Zingis; and while the emir Timour reigned over Zagatai and the East, a nominal khan served as a private officer in the armies of his servant. A fertile kingdom, five hundred miles in length and in breadth, might have satisfied the ambition of a subject; but Timour aspired to the dominion of the world; and before his death the crown of Zagatai was one of the twenty-seven crowns which he had placed on his head.—GIBBON’S ROME, ch. 65, p. 249.

6185. YOUNG MEN, Triumphant. *Isaac Newton. Young men, it has been often remarked, do the greatest things. Newton was but twenty-three when he made his greatest discovery. In the autumn of 1665, the college having been dismissed on account of the prevalence of the plague, he spent several weeks at home. Seated in his mother’s orchard one day, while the ripe fruit was falling from the trees, he fell into one of his profound meditations upon the nature of the force that caused the apples to fall.—PAR-TON’S NEWTON, p. 81.

6186. YOUNG MEN, Visions of. *John Adams. At Worcester [Mass.] . . . he was the master of the town school, where the highest wages were sixty dollars for the season. A young man of hardly twenty, just from Harvard College, and at that time meditating to become a preacher, would sit and hear [the general political conversation], and escaping from a maze of observations, would sometimes retire, and by “laying things together, form some reflections pleasing” to himself. . . . If we can remove the turbulent Gallics, our people, according to the exactest calculations, will in another century become more numerous than England itself. All Europe will not be able to subdue us. The only way to keep us from setting up for ourselves is to disunite us.” . . . Within twenty-one years he shall assist in declaring his country’s independence; in less than thirty . . . shall stand before the King of Great Britain the acknowledged envoy of the free and United States of America.—BANCROFT’S U. S., vol. 4, ch. 9.

6187. YOUNG MEN, Work of. *Chinese Gordon. Gordon had just turned thirty—a young man, truly, for a task so arduous [the command of the Chinese army]. But men of his stamp are not to be judged by their years. The art of war, perhaps more than any other art, demands experience in its successful practitioners. But sometimes, although rarely, soldiers move to the front in whom an innate genius for war dispenses with the tuition of experience. Sheridan, when he sent Early “whirling up the Shenandoah Valley,” had not Gordon’s years when the latter took the command of the “Ever Victorious Army.” Randal Mackenzie at twenty-one was pronounced by General Grant the finest cavalry division commander of the Union armies. Skobelev had conquered Khokand before he reached eight-and-twenty. To cite a more illustrious example, Napoleon was but twenty-seven when he carried the Bridge of Lodi. Gordon was in the prime of mental and physical vigor. He had been a constant student of the art military; his nature was at once enterprising and cautious; he seemed to control his fellow-men by an intuitive influence; and the buoyancy of his temperament sustained him in every situation.—CHINESE GORDON, p. 35.

6188. YOUTH, Ardor of. *Lafayette. He was scarcely nineteen years of age when he sought a secret interview with Silas Deane, the American envoy, and offered his services to the Congress. Mr. Deane, it appears, objected to his youth. “When,” says he, “I presented to the envoy my boyish face, I spoke more of my ardor in the cause than of my experience; but I dwelt much upon the effect my departure would excite in France, and he signed our mutual agreement.” His intention was concealed from his family and from all his friends, except two or three confidants. While he was making preparations for his departure, most distressing and alarming news came from America—the retreat from Long Island, the loss of New York, the battle of White Plains, and the retreat through New Jersey. The American forces, it was said, reduced to a disheartened band of three thousand militia, were pursued by a triumphant army of thirty-three thousand English and Hessians. The credit of the colonies at Paris sunk to the lowest ebb, and some of the Americans themselves confessed to Lafayette that they were discouraged, and persuaded him to abandon his project. He said to Mr. Deane: “Until now, sir, you have only seen my ardor in your cause, and that may not prove at present wholly useless. I shall purchase a ship to carry out your officers. We must feel confidence in the future; and it is especially in the hour of danger that I wish to share your fortune.”—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 476.

6189. YOUTH, Attractive. *Mahomet. He seems to have cultivated . . . his moral qualities with equal assiduity as the intellectual. His beauty, his modesty, his sequestration from the profane pleasures of the Khoreishite youth, his assiduity to prayer in the temple, his respect for the aged, his attention to treasuring up the sayings of the wise, his filial affection for his adopted father, Aboutaleb, his deference toward the son of his uncle, of whom he was the guest, without affecting to be the equal, his taste for solitude, his reveries—a sort of cloud under which he veiled the splendor of his intellect—in fine, his sober eloquence, which never spoke until interrogated, but which flowed from the soul rather than the lips, and which had the gift of persuading others, because it was persuasion in himself—all these qualities of birth, of body, of mind, of character, esteemed everywhere, even among barbarians, drew the esteem, the affection, the eyes of Mecca upon the orphan of Amina. They attracted, above all, the heart of an opulent and influential woman of Mecca, named Kadidje, or Kadidjah.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY.

6190. YOUTH, Backwardness in. Washington Irving. Master Irving was not a prodigy; for at the first school, kept by a woman, to which he was sent in his fourth year, and where he remained upward of two years, he learned little beyond his alphabet; and at the second, where boys and girls were taught, and where he remained until he was fourteen, he was more noted for his truth-telling than for his scholarship.—STODDARD'S IRVING, p. 12.

6191. YOUTH, Capacity in. Washington. At the age of sixteen he was sent by his uncle to survey a tract of land on the South Potomac, and for three years his life was in the wilderness.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 38, p. 302.

6192. YOUTH corrected. Aristotle. Aristotle was born at Stagyræ, a Thracian city, then under the dominion of Macedonia. His father was physician to Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. After a youth of dissipation he betook himself with indefatigable ardor to the study of philosophy, and was for twenty years a favorite disciple of Plato.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 2, ch. 9, p. 273.

6193. YOUTH corrupted. By Catiline. The party of revolution was as various as it was wide. Powerful, wealthy men belonged to it, who were politically dissatisfied; ambitious men of rank, whose money embarrassments weighted them in the race against their competitors; . . . and, finally, Catiline's own chosen comrades, the smooth-faced patrician youths with curled hair and redolent with perfumes, as yet beardless or with the first down upon their chins, wearing scarves and veils and sleeved tunics reaching to their ankles, industrious but only with the dice-box, night-watchers but in the supper-rooms, in the small hours before dawn, immodest, dissolute boys, whose education had been in learning to love and to be loved, to sing and to dance naked at the midnight orgies, and along with it to handle poniards and mix poisoned bowls. Well might Cicero be alarmed at such a combination; well might he say that if a generation of such youths lived to manhood there would be a commonwealth of Catilines.—FROUDE'S CÆSAR, ch. 11.

6194. YOUTH, Enemies in. William, Prince of Orange. The able and experienced ministers of the [Dutch] Republic, mortal enemies of his name, came every day to pay their feigned civilities to him and to observe the progress of his mind. The first movements of his ambition were carefully watched; every unguarded word uttered by him was noted down; nor had he near him any adviser on whose judgment reliance could be placed. He was scarcely fifteen years old when all the domestics who were attached to his interest, or who enjoyed any share of his confidence, were removed from under his roof by the jealous government. He remonstrated with energy beyond his years, but in vain. Vigilant observers saw the tears more than once rise in the eyes of the young State prisoner. His health, naturally delicate, sank for a time under the emotions which his desolate situation had produced. Such situations bewilder and unnerve the weak, but call forth all the strength of the strong. Surrounded by snares in which an ordinary youth would have perished, William learned to tread at once warily and firmly. Long before he reached manhood he knew how to keep secrets, how to baffle curiosity by dry and guarded answers, how to conceal all passions under the same show of grave tranquillity.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 7, p. 150.

6195. YOUTH, Folly of. Edgar Allan Poe. The acquisition of knowledge was easy to him, and he could without serious effort have carried off the highest honors of his class. But he drank to excess; and as drink is the ally of all the other vices, he gambled recklessly, and led so disorderly a life that he was expelled from the college. His adopted father refusing to pay his gambling debts, the young man wrote him a foolish, insulting letter, took passage for Europe, and set off, as he said, to assist the Greeks in their struggle for independence.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 739.

6196. YOUTH, Fountain of. Florida. Juan Ponce de Leon, who had been a companion of Columbus on his second voyage, fitted out a private expedition of discovery and adventure. De Leon had grown rich as governor of Porto Rico, and while growing rich had also grown old. But there was a fountain of perpetual youth somewhere in the Bahamas—so said all the learning and intelligence of Spain—and in that fountain the wrinkled old cavalier would bathe and be young again. . . . A landing was effected a short distance north of where, a half century later, were laid the foundations of St. Augustine. The country was claimed for the King of Spain, and the search for the youth-restoring-fountain was eagerly prosecuted. The romantic adventurer turned southward, explored the coast for many leagues, discovered and named the Tortugas, doubled Cape Florida, and then sailed back to Porto Rico not perceptibly younger than when he started.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 8, p. 57.

6197. YOUTH, Genius in. Isaac Newton. See No. 6185.

6198. YOUTH, Hardships in. George Washington. Son of a widow, . . . to read, to write, to cipher—these had been his degrees in knowledge. And now at sixteen years of age, in quest of an honest maintenance, encountering intolerable toil; . . . "himself his own cook, having no spit but a forked stick, no plate but a large chip" [while engaged as a surveyor], . . . rarely sleeping in a bed, . . . this stripling surveyor of the woods . . . God had selected . . . to give an impulse to human affairs, and, as far as events can depend on an individual, had placed the rights and destinies of countless millions in the keeping of the widow's son.—BANCROFT'S U. S., vol. 3, ch. 24.

6199. — — —. Chauncey Jerome. [The inventor of brass clocks.] At fifteen he was bound apprentice to a carpenter, and was soon able to do a man's work at the business. Apprentices at that day were not much indulged, Chauncey Jerome, when he visited his mother, had to walk all night, so as not to use his master's time, and he had sometimes to trudge a whole summer's day on foot, with his tools on his back, in order to get to the work he had to do. Several times during his apprenticeship he carried his tools thirty miles in one day. There were few vehicles then except farmer's wagons.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 211.

6200. ———. Lincoln. In 1816 his father removed to Spencer County, Indiana—just then admitted into the Union—and built a cabin in the woods near the present village of Gentryville. Here was the scene of Lincoln's boyhood—a constant struggle with poverty, hardship, and toil. At the age of sixteen we find him managing a ferry across the Ohio, at the mouth of Anderson Creek, a service for which he was paid six dollars per month. In his youth he received in the aggregate about one year of schooling, which was all he ever had in the way of education.—RIDPATH'S U. S., ch. 61, p. 482.

6201. YOUTH, Hope in. Mahomet. Mahomet labored to attach to him all that portion of his family which did not yet profess his religion. "What are you afraid of?" said he to them at the end of a repast. "Never did Arab make an offer to his nation of advantages to be compared to those I bring you. I offer you happiness in this transitory life, and eternal felicity in the life to come. God has commissioned me to bring Him back mankind. Let me see which of you is willing to aid me in this work; to become my second, my brother, my substitute upon the earth." Astonishment, terror, backwardness, incredulity, kept all of them to silence and their seats. No one arose; all sat in mute embarrassment. Mahomet was going to be left alone, when the youngest of the guests, Ali, as yet almost a child, coming to the aid of his second father, rose with the naïve generosity of his years, and exclaimed, "I, prophet of God! I will, in default of others." Mahomet, affected to tears, and seeing in this burst of a mere youth, the least considerable of the guests, a designation of the finger of God, who marks where men are not observing, clasped the boy to his heart. "Very well," said he, no more ashamed of this disciple than the disciple had been of him, "behold ye Ali, my son, my second, my brother, my other self; obey him!" This election of a child by the inspired prophet scandalized the company to even laughter.—LAMARTINE'S TURKEY, p. 73.

6202. YOUTH, Humble. Romulus—Remus. . . . rose to distinction from very small beginnings. For the two brothers were reputed slaves and sons of herdsmen; and yet, before they attained to liberty themselves, they bestowed it on almost all the Latins; gaining at once the most glorious titles, as destroyers of their enemies, deliverers of kindred, kings of nations, and founders of cities, not transplanters.—PLUTARCH'S ROMULUS AND THESEUS.

6203. YOUTH an Index. Charles I. and Cromwell. The future monarch and future Protector met [at Hinchinbrook House], and engaged each other in childish sport, in which Charles got the worst of it. For what fixed the attention of the lovers of prognostications in that and succeeding ages, was that "the youths had not been long together before Charles and Oliver disagreed; and, as the former was then as weakly as the latter was strong, it was no wonder that the royal visitant was worsted; and Oliver, even at this age, so little regarded dignity, that he made the royal blood flow in copious streams from the prince's nose." "This," adds the author, "was looked upon as a bad presage for the king when the civil wars commenced."—HOOD'S CROMWELL, ch. 2, p. 31.

6204. YOUTH, Manhood out of. Peter Cooper. He found, after long searching, a place in the carriage shop of Burtis & Woodward, on the corner of Broadway and Chambers Street, where a great marble structure was afterward raised by A. T. Stewart, and there he bound himself out as an apprentice until he should reach the age of twenty-one. He was to receive his board and a salary of $25 a year. Here he began life in earnest, and he attributed his after success in a great degree to those four years of steady, hard work, with the economy which his little earnings enforced; and during the whole time he not only did not run in debt one cent, but he always had a little money laid by.—LESTER'S LIFE OF PETER COOPER, p. 13.

6205. YOUTH, Mental Bias in. Gibbon. The subject he selected was a curious one for a youth in his sixteenth year. It was an attempt to settle the chronology of the age of Sesostris, and shows how soon the austere side of history had attracted his attention. "In my childish balance," he says, "I presumed to weigh the systems of Scaliger and Petavius, of Marsham and of Newton; and my sleep has been disturbed by the difficulty of reconciling the Septuagint with the Hebrew computation." Of course his essay had the usual value of such juvenile production—that is, none at all, except as an indication of early bias to serious study of history.—MORRISON'S GIBBON, ch. 1.

6206. YOUTH neglected. Peter the Great. The education of Peter, the destined monarch of a prodigious empire, was almost totally neglected. Russia did not much value knowledge at that time, but Peter was even more ignorant than was usual with Russian boys of high rank, for his sister Sophia, an ambitious and bad woman, purposely kept him in ignorance, that she might the more easily retain an ascendancy over him, and over Russia through him. Notwithstanding this, he had picked up a little knowledge, since he had that sure sign of intellect which we call curiosity. He was a great asker of questions, fond of looking on while work was doing, and of trying his own hand at it.—CYCLOPEDIA OF BIOG., p. 426.

6207. YOUTH, Perfecting. Swedenborg says. Children in heaven grow up into young men and women, and the aged return to the freshness of early manhood. They who are in heaven are continually advancing to the spring-time of life, and the more thousands of years they live the more delightful and happy is the spring to which they attain; and this progression goes on to eternity. Good women who have died old and worn out with age, after a succession of years come more and more into the flower of youth, and into a beauty which exceeds all the conceptions of beauty which can be formed from what the eye has seen. In a word, to grow old in heaven is to grow young.—WHITE'S SWEDENBORG, ch. 13, p. 115.

6208. YOUTH, Preparation in. Washington. To the encomiums which he [Lafayette] lavished upon his hero and paternal chief, she [the mother of Washington] replied in these words: "I am not surprised at what George has done, for he always was a good boy."—CUSTIS' WASHINGTON, vol. 1, ch. 1.

6209. YOUTH, Presumption of. Louis XIV. [The famous French minister] Mazarin had died in the year 1661, with the honor of having brought about the peace of Westphalia and the treaty of the Pyrenees; and Louis, whom he had hitherto led about as a child, assumed himself the reins of government. He had borne the yoke of Mazarin with great impatience, and in some instances had shown that impetuosity of temper which strongly characterized his disposition. Upon occasion of a meeting of the parliament of Paris, where some of the royal edicts were called in question, Louis, then a boy of sixteen years of age, entered the hall of parliament in boots, with a whip in his hand; and, confident of the powers of an absolute prince, told them, with an air of high authority, that he was acquainted with the audacity of their procedure, and would take care to restrain them within the bounds of their just prerogatives. Upon the death of Mazarin the first acts of the administration of Louis were rather violent than politic.—TYTLER'S HIST., Book 6, ch. 34, p. 457.

6210. YOUTH, Regard for. "Rising Sun." When Pompey arrived at Rome [from his victories in Africa] he demanded a triumph, in which he was opposed by Sylla. The latter alleged that the laws did not allow that honor to any person who was not either consul or prætor. Hence it was that the first Scipio, when he returned victorious from greater wars and conflicts with the Carthaginians in Spain, did not demand a triumph; for he was neither consul nor prætor. He added that if Pompey, who was yet little better than a beardless youth, and who was not of age to be admitted into the Senate, should enter the city in triumph, it would bring an odium both upon the dictator's power and those honors of his friend. These arguments Sylla insisted on, to show him he would not allow of his triumph, and that, in case he persisted, he would chastise his obstinacy. Pompey, not in the least intimidated, bade him consider that more worshipped the rising than the setting sun; intimating that his power was increasing, and Sylla's upon the decline. Sylla did not well hear what he said, but perceiving by the looks and gestures of the company that they were struck with the expression, he asked what it was. When he was told it he admired the spirit of Pompey, and cried, "Let him triumph! Let him triumph!"—PLUTARCH'S POMPEY.

6211. YOUTH, Studios. John Milton. If Milton's genius did not announce itself in his paraphrases of Psalms, it did in his impetuosity in learning, "which I seized with such eagerness that from the twelfth year of my age I scarce ever went to bed before midnight." Such is his own account. . . . Aubrey's words are: "When he was very young he studied very hard, and sate up very late, commonly till twelve or one o'clock at night; and his father ordered the maid to sit up for him."—PATTISON'S MILTON, ch. 1.

6212. YOUTH, Training of. Persians. The education of children was looked upon as the most important duty and the most essential part of government; it was not left to the care of fathers and mothers, whose blind affection and fondness often rendered them incapable of that office; but the State took it upon themselves. Boys were all brought up in common, after one uniform manner, where everything was regulated, the place and length of their exercises, the times of eating, the quality of their meat and drink, and their different kinds of punishment. The only food allowed either the children or the young men was bread, cresses, and water; for their design was to accustom them early to temperance and sobriety; besides, they considered that a plain, frugal diet, without any mixture of sauces or ragouts, would strengthen the body, and lay such a foundation of health as would enable them to undergo the hardships and fatigues of war to a good old age. Here boys went to school to learn justice and virtue, as they do in other places to learn arts and sciences; and the crime most severely punished among them was ingratitude. The design of the Persians in all these wise regulations was to prevent evil, being convinced that it is much better to prevent faults than to punish them; and whereas in other States the legislators are satisfied with enacting punishments for criminals, the Persians endeavored so to order it as to have no criminals among them.—ROLLIN'S HIST., Book 4, art. 1, § 1.

6213. YOUTH, Unpromising. Abraham Lincoln. One of his teachers, . . . Mr. Dorsey, . . . tells how his pupil came to the log-cabin school-house arrayed in buckskin clothes, a raccoon-skin cap, and provided with an old arithmetic, which had somewhere been found for him, to begin his investigations into the higher branches.—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, ch. 2, p. 21.

6214. YOUTH, Wildness in. George Müller. After obtaining from his tutor leave of absence under false pretences, he set off on a pleasure excursion to Magdeburg, went afterward to Brunswick, and lived at both places in an expensive manner at hotels, until all the money he had managed to scrape together for the journey was expended. On his way back to Heimersleben, he stopped at Wolfenbüttel, went to an hotel there, and again began to live as though he had plenty of money at his command; but having been suspected, he was followed, and when he walked quietly out of the yard, without having settled his account, and afterward attempted to run away, he was arrested and sent to prison, where, when only sixteen years of age, he found himself shut up with the most depraved characters, such as thieves, murderers, etc. From December 18, 1821, to January 12, 1822, he was detained in prison, when his father, having sent money to discharge his debt at the hotel, to defray the cost of his maintenance in jail, and to pay his travelling expenses, he was set at liberty.—MÜLLER'S LIFE OF GEORGE MÜLLER, p. 10.

6215. ZEAL for Art. Protogenes. Rhodes was . . . the residence of a celebrated painter, named Protogenes, who was a native of Canus, a city of Caria, which was then subject to the Rhodians. The apartment where he painted was in the suburbs, without the city, when Demetrius first besieged it; but neither the presence of the enemies who then surrounded him nor the noise of arms that perpetually rung in his ears could induce him to quit his habitation or discontinue his work. The king was surprised at his conduct, and he one day asked him his reasons for such a proceeding. "It is," replied he

"because I am sensible you have declared war against the Rhodians, and not against the sciences." Nor was he deceived in that opinion, for Demetrius actually showed himself their protector. He planted a guard round his house.—ROLIN'S HIST., Book 16, § 8.

6216. ZEAL, Christian. George Whitefield. [During the thirty-four years of his ministerial life Rev. George Whitefield preached eighteen thousand sermons, travelled through England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, and traversed the American colonies from Maine to Georgia. His last sermon was two hours long. The same evening,] while at supper, the pavement in front of the house, and even its hall, were crowded with people, impatient to hear a few words from his eloquent lips; but he was exhausted, and rising from the table, said to one of the clergymen who were with him, "Brother, you must talk to this dear people; I cannot say a word." Taking a candle, he hastened toward his bedroom; but before reaching it he was arrested by the suggestion of his own generous heart that he ought not thus to desert an anxious crowd, hungering for the bread of life from his hands. He paused on the stairs to address them. He had preached his last sermon, and this was to be his last exhortation. He lingered on the stairway, while the crowd gazed at him with tearful eyes, as Elisha at the ascending prophet. His voice, never, perhaps, surpassed in its music and pathos, flowed on until the candle which he held in his hand burned away and went out in its socket! The next morning he was not, for God had taken him! He died of asthma, September 30, 1770.—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 466.

6217. ZEAL encouraged. Abraham Lincoln. [He was not jealous of a member of his cabinet who was also a candidate for the presidency, and showed vigor and energy in his department.] "My brother and I . . . were once ploughing corn on a Kentucky farm, I driving the horse and he holding the plough. The horse was lazy, but on one occasion rushed across the field, so that I, with my long legs, could scarcely keep pace with him. . . . I found an enormous chin-fly fastened on him, and knocked it off. . . . My brother asked me what I did that for. I told him I didn't want the old horse bitten in that way. 'Why,' said my brother, 'that's all that made him go.' Now," said Mr. Lincoln, "if Mr. — has a presidential chin-fly biting him, I'm not going to knock it off; it will only make his department go."—RAYMOND'S LINCOLN, p. 720.

6218. ZEAL, Imprudent. Execution of Charles I. In no long time it became manifest that those political and religious zealots, to whom this deed is to be ascribed, had committed, not only a crime, but an error. They had given to a prince, hitherto known to his people chiefly by his faults, an opportunity of displaying, on a great theatre, before the eyes of all nations and all ages, some qualities which irresistibly call forth the admiration and love of mankind, the high spirit of a gallant gentleman, the patience and meekness of a penitent Christian; nay, they had so contrived their revenge, that the very man whose whole life had been a series of attacks on the liberties of England now seemed to die a martyr in the cause of those very liberties.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 1, p. 120.

6219. ZEAL, Ineffective. John Milton. [The restoration of monarchy was foreshadowed.] A fury of utterance was upon him, and he poured out, during the death-throes of the republic, pamphlet upon pamphlet, as fast as he could get them written to his dictation. These extemporized effusions betray in their style, hurry, and confusion the restlessness of a coming despair. The passionate enthusiasm of the early tracts is gone, and all the old faults, the obscurity, the inconsecutiveness, the want of arrangement, are exaggerated. In the "Ready Way" there is a monster sentence of thirty-nine lines, containing three hundred and thirty-six words.—MILTON, BY M. PATTISON, ch. 11.

6220. ZEAL misdirected. Ladies. [Addison, in the Freeholder, says the lady politicians of his time] are so taken up with zeal for the Church that they cannot find time to teach their children the catechism.—KNIGHT'S ENG., vol. 5, ch. 27, p. 417.

6221. ZEAL punished. Rev. Charles Wesley. He had charge of the curacy of Islington, but "was ejected from it, not so much because of his doctrine, as for the earnestness with which he uttered it."—STEVENS' METHODISM, vol. 1, p. 110.

6222. ZEAL, Sectarian. James II. He seems . . . to have been seized with an unusually violent fit of zeal for his religion; and this is the more remarkable because he had just relapsed, after a short interval of self-restraint, into debauchery. . . . Lady Dorchester had returned from Dublin, and was again the king's mistress. Her return was politically of no importance. She had learned by experience the folly of attempting to save her lover from the destruction to which he was running headlong. She therefore suffered the Jesuits to guide his political conduct, and they, in return, suffered her to wheedle him out of money. She was, however, only one of several abandoned women who at this time shared, with his beloved Church, the dominion over his mind. He seems to have determined to make some amends for neglecting the welfare of his own soul by taking care of the souls of others.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 6, p. 139.

6223. ZEAL, Unrewarded. "The Pretender." In the evening [Mary, wife of James II.,] sat playing cards at Whitehall till near midnight. Then she was carried in a sedan to Saint James' Palace, where apartments had been very hastily fitted up for her reception. Soon messengers were running about in all directions to summon physicians and priests, lords of the council, and ladies of the bedchamber. In a few hours many public functionaries and women of rank were assembled in the queen's room. There, on the morning of Sunday, the 10th of June, a day long kept sacred by the too faithful adherents of a bad cause, was born the most unfortunate of princes [James Francis Edward Stuart, the Pretender,] destined to seventy-seven years of exile and wandering, of vain projects, of honors more galling than insults, and of hopes such as make the heart sick.—MACAULAY'S ENG., ch. 8, p. 334.
